One Kind of Answer

Fraternities at Oregon State college have just given the entire Greek set-up a shot in the arm by their much publicized Hell week to "Help" week efforts. And, beyond this, they've spread a bit of good will for the college system in general, one which some people apparently think is a rat's nest of lush living, Communism and cheating.

The program at OSC, which turned upwards of 600 men loose on Corvallis and Benton county churches, hospital and park, is not original with that campus, as nearly as we can tell. But, after all, good ideas are a dime a dozen; it's the person or the organization that puts the ideas into effect that should get a good share of the credit. And in this case, they certainly have.

We doubt if anyone would deny that one of the primary aims at Oregon State was to get some "good" publicity. And that doesn't seem so evil. We do the same thing with our Halloween party for Eugene kids, having, incidentally, a good time.

The whole effort was, in a way, kind of a rebuttal to a statement made in a proof copy of a new magazine called Prospects, to the effect that colleges and universities have several ways of hitting the front page—by having Communism discovered (or at least spoken of as) on the campus; by conducting a pantie raid; or by inducing some of the local athletes to accept bribes.

While this may very well be true, Oregon State has just demonstrated that you don't have to be bad to be talked (or written) about.

And while we're on the subject of "good works," it behooves us to congratulate those who participated in the Millrace clean-up Saturday. We imagine those who were down in the mucky bed of that seldom stream would have gladly changed places with church window scrubbers or grass cutters.

No matter. Point is that we "worthless" college students were willing to get our hands dirty for a good cause. And, 'tis reported, they found a lot of stuff in the bottom of the 'race—just about everything but Communism.

History Professor To Join UO Staff

Wendell Holmes Stephenson, currently professor of history and chairman of the division of social science in Tulane University, will be a member of the University of Oregon's history department next year.

The announcement of Stephenson's appointment was made by Gordon Wright, head of the history department. The appointment is subject to the approval of the Oregon State Board of Higher Education.

Editor of the Mississippi Valley Historical Review since 1946, Stephenson has compiled a wide background in his profession and in scholarly publications. He has taught at the University of Kentucky, Louisiana State university and Tulane. He received his doctorate from the University of Michigan and he also holds an honorary Doctor of Literature degree from Duke university.

Library Contest Prizes Offered

A total of $200 will be awarded in prizes for the annual Library Day contest sponsored by the Co-op, the University library, House Librarians and the Association of Patrons and Friends of the University library.

The contest with both general and specialized divisions is open to all graduate and undergraduate students. From 20 to 50 books may be entered in either field. The total number of books and the cost involved is not considered in judging.

A general library includes a wide background of books from many fields, while a specialized library centers on one field and those directly related to it. The library should contain books which have a particular meaning for their owner and a selection of titles reflecting the broadening interest of the collector.

Entries are due May 8, and books must be arranged in the reserve room of the library by May 9. Further information on the contest may be had by contacting Bernice Rise in the Student Union browsing room.
