Trade School

"I got an 'F' in his lecture course, but he gave me an 'A' on my knitting"

It Can Be Done

Oregon again has an "O" in good condition, after Bob Simpson, junior class representative and finance chairman of Junior Weekend, got some of his fraternity brothers together to pour concrete and paint the Skinner's Butte "O".

This is the second time this year that an individual has taken charge of a project which, we believe, might well have been done by the ASUO senate.

This time it was Simpson, a senator himself (and his house). Last time it was Dave Todd, who lives in a millrace house, and who organized a cleanup project and got the Eugene city manager to come forth with a program for long-range action.

The senate had a committee on the millrace, but Todd had no connection with that group. His results (though they haven't solved the situation, by any means) could have been those of the committee, with more aggressive work.

So, too, could have been the rehabilitation of the "O", damaged by an explosion last spring. The senate had considered this project, but felt that the cost would be prohibitive of action.

Simpson and his mates, not attempting as extensive an "O" as the senate considered, did the job at a cost of about ten dollars. Technically, the result wasn't perfect, but it looks good from the city of Eugene.

Now we don't want to quibble about who gets the credit for doing a job. The point is that a more and aggressive attitude on the part of the senate would produce more results on such matters. (Re the "O", half a loaf is better than none.)

A corporate body like the senate might not have the intense interest like Todd or Simpson, but that groups is supposed to represent the students.

Much criticism has been leveled at the senate and student government this year, part of it by the Emerald, as not being worthwhile enough, at least in practice. These two incidents are examples of what some students have done in the absence of real senate action.

The power of the senate is limited by the areas controlled by the faculty and/or the administration, obviously, but initiative on the part of the senate representing student opinion can do a lot more than ever has been done.

We hope that the newly-elected senate will see fit to attend meetings, and to work as hard as possible on as many areas of potential senate actions as possible. Election to the senate is not just an honor; it implies a responsibility.

The new senate can do something to show that student government doesn't have to be the object of ridicule if it will really work hard for student concern.—A.K.

Richter, who called himself a "wanderer between two worlds," said emphatically, "I am not a German; though I was born German, I am an American."

Chased out of Germany by "Mr. Hitler," Richter became an American citizen. He returned to Germany after the war because he felt he could help in "re-educating the German people," but he still holds his American citizenship.

"A highly gifted nation such as Germany has a tremendous difficulty in the political, international field," Richter said, "But we are now trying hard to change things." The prospect of restoration is a big problem, according to Richter, but with unification he hopes to see the political field catch up with the intellectual fields.

Responsibility for Micronesians Realized by Few, Says Barnett

Homer Barnett, professor of anthropology, stated in a Tuesday night browsing room lecture that "there are very few Americans who are aware of their responsibility to the Micronesians, 55,000 natives who inhabit the numerous islands and coral reefs in the South Pacific."

The territory of Micronesia has changed hands many times, he continued, passing from Spanish, German and Japanese control to the United States, which administers the area under the auspices of the United Nations.

The islands are a liability to the United States, Barnett remarked, since we support public health, education and transportation ventures of the Micronesians, yet receive no economic returns.

Other problems in governing the area arise from the fact that the younger nations in the UN are watching our conduct in the region very closely, he said.

Barnett, who was recently employed by the high commissioner on Piloah, concluded by showing colored slides he had taken during his stay in Micronesia.
