Early Rushing --and Misgivings

Formal men's rushing is underway, the first fall term men's rush week since 1950-51, when these seniors were freshmen.

That was the first year of deferred living, and was to be the first of winter term men's rushing. But IFC's pre-rushing "hands-off" policy that year prompted complaints by Football Coach Jim Aiken that freshman athletes were leaving the University because they felt that the fraternity men were unfriendly.

So rushing was held in November. The last two years, however, it has been held winter term, the theory being that freshman men should have at least a term to establish themselves academically before concerning themselves with fraternity ties and activity.

But this proved somewhat unrealistic, because it was too much to expect of fraternities to completely ignore freshmen until winter term, especially with the rugged rushing competition brought about by decreased enrollment. Some houses did adhere pretty much to the "hands-off" policy, but the disadvantage caused these houses made it a pretty hard thing to continue.

This year, then, there is no "hands-off" policy. With "dirty rushing" impossible, pre-rush week rushing has been in the open and heavy.

The fraternities, in general, are pretty pleased to have fall term rushing. They can climax summer rushing with three weeks of fall rushing, culminating in the pledge. Previously summer rushing was followed by a cold "hands-off" period, and the men's houses felt frustrated. A feeling grew up that Oregon, at least its fraternities, was snobbish.

Many fraternity men, however, would rather have a winter term rush period (and fall term "hands-off"), or else rush during orientation week. They complain about the strain of excessive competitive rushing for three weeks, with the mental, physical, and financial demands made upon house members.

There may be another fly in the fraternity ointment. This year some 380 men signed up for rushing, compared with around 170 last winter term. This could mean a heavier pledge group, or at least more of a choice. But with the freshman class untried scholastically, there is no guarantee that any more, or any "better" (academically) men will be back with the fraternities next fall.

Human nature being what it is, fall term rushing is more realistic. But fall term men's rushing, unless the fraternities should prove to be especially concerned about the academic records of their pledges, will contribute less to the scholastic endeavors of the University than winter term rushing.

Said endeavors, of course, not being the complete aspect of Oregon, but they certainly are its chief purpose.
