'Brown's Body' Plays at Igloo

The production of "John Brown's Body," which will be presented in McArthur court Monday by the Eugene-University Civic Music association, found its beginning in the very early life of Producer Paul Gregory.

Born into a poor family, Gregory relates that he remembers possessing only two books, the Bible and "John Brown's Body." At Drake university, as a participant in the drama department, he memorized excerpts from the poem for oratorical contests, and then the work lay in the back of his mind until his successful production of George Bernard Shaw's "Don Juan in Hell" in 1951.

In producing "John Brown's Body" Gregory has preserved the original lines of the poet, Stephen Vincent Benet, using his cast as readers. The stars, Tyrone Power, Anne Baxter and Raymond Massey, act against a musical background provided by the Walter Schumann Choral group.

Sharing Gregory's enthusiasm for the project bringing Benet's poem to the theater medium is Charles Laughton, director. He also worked with Gregory as director and member of the First Drama Quartette in the earlier "Don Juan in Hell."

Another Professor Discovers Evidence of Primitive Indians

Information concerning the historical knowledge of the primitive Indian has been uncovered by Luther S. Cressman, professor of anthropology, and members of the anthropology department in a series of excavations, carried on over a period of six months, in The Dalles area.

Archeological material, salvaged from the excavations, may prove that the Indians of the coastal region traded directly or indirectly with the tribes east of the Rocky mountains, and with tribes as far north as Vancouver Island, Canada. The number and location of their trading posts is unknown and remains a question in the minds of anthropologists.

However, fragments of knives, dishes and tools, all foreign to the native Wasco Indians of The Dalles region, bear out the theory that the Indians of many tribes were using The Dalles region as a trading post long before the appearance of Lewis and Clark in 1805.

Whether these Indians all came to The Dalles area to do their trading or exchanged goods in many similar trading areas, bartering of this kind would have entailed a trading route, for many of the tribes were virtually cut off from the coastal region by the Rocky mountains.

Cressman named the Columbia river as perhaps a principle trade route. Numerous other rivers were also in the trading route, for the evidence points to a greater amount of inland trading rather than coastal trading.

Cressman added that it was difficult to tell which Indians had actually done the trading, and which tribes passed on what they had received from other tribes.

History of Money Displayed With Pacific Coast Highlights

The history of money, from the earliest Indian wampum to the second World War invasion currency, is now on display in the circulation lobby of the University library. The exhibit was prepared by the social science division.

Complete with books, pamphlets, pictures and samples from the history of money, the exhibit also shows the contrast of hard and soft money plus pictures illustrating the development of banking on the Pacific coast.

The primitive beginning of money is illustrated with samples of wampum, made from dentalium shells, used by Oregon Indians. Its later developments are shown in a collection of specimens from the Chase National bank.

A sample of depression currency is illustrated by a 25-cent sheepskin note which was issued by the businessmen of Heppner, Ore., during the bank closure of 1933.

Also on display are samples of invasion currency issued by the United States and Japan during the Second World War.

The display of hard money includes a pamphlet by the $120 Gold Club of Yreka, Calif., which proposes to solve the country's problems by raising the price of gold from $35 to $120 an ounce. Several confederate bills, a hundred-thousand mark issued during the inflationary period in Germany, and a three dollar, interest bearing bill issued in 1786 by Massachusetts illustrate samples of soft or inflated money.

The phase of the exhibit showing the development of western banking includes account books of pioneer merchant-bankers and photographs taken in 1860 of the Jacksonville, Ore., bank. This bank, one of the first in Oregon, was located in the gold fields of the Siskiyou mountains.
