Will The U.N. Break Down?

Is the United Nations destined to break down? Eight years old this week, the UN is in a position where it faces the possibility of collapse in coming years, although this is by no means an impending event. Potentially, however, the seeds are there.

Russia and her satellites oppose the most effective moves or attempts at same by the UN, because these are ones directed at the most-feared force in the world today: Communism. The Communists remain in the UN because within it they can do most to obstruct it; but it is fortunate that they do.

If they were outside, the world organization could not accomplish what it is doing, helping to keep a tentative, if shaky, standoff between the East and West. But Russia will prevent any sweeping attempt by the UN to remove the menacing position of the Communists.

Other countries involved in squabbles, such as the French-Morocco, Israel-Jordan, and Italy-Yugoslavia tiffs, do not wish the UN to fall, but they must choose between altruistic support of it down the line and their own interests; right now it looks like the latter has priority.

Perhaps the position of the United States will have the most effect on the UN's future. What with the fear of many Americans that the UN is a super-ogre trying to sublimate the importance of the United States in world affairs, or a nest of spies, or both, we may eventually refuse to give it necessary support. Our official foreign policy, however, is still one of support for the UN.

One of the safeguards against any loss of sovereignty by this country, emphasized by supporters of the United Nations, is the veto power in the Security Council, and the right to ignore any majority action of the General Assembly. Which points up what may be the eventual downfall of the UN, its relative impotence in matters of the greatest significance.

Not that the UN is without value. Its relative success in Greece, Israel, Indonesia, Libya, and Korea indicates that it has accomplished a lot in world affairs, and is playing a role of important mediator. But the measure of unselfishness on the part of involved nations which the UN must have in order to function adequately (as must any organization) may not be available in the event of a major showdown.

In such event, the UN might go the way of past organizations founded along the same lines. Then we can say that the UN accomplished much, but was another victim of human foibles, lacking unqualified support.

In any case, the UN does not seem to be a final answer to the world's problems, but it is a valuable factor in preserving world peace today, and may thus contribute to an eventual better world.

Attorney Chosen For Faculty Post

Bordon Wood, a former Portland attorney, was appointed to the law school faculty last week by Orlando J. Hollis, dean of the school. His appointment as associate professor of law is subject to confirmation by the Oregon State Board of Higher Education. Until his voluntary retirement last year at the age of 55, Wood had spent more than 30 years with the 70-year old firm of King, Miller, Anderson and Nash in Portland. He received his bachelor of law degree from the University in 1922.

The new appointee has taught law at Northwestern College of Law in Portland over a period of some 20 years. He will teach classes in partnership, corporation and evidence here.

Wood has picked up a wide background in corporation law during his years of handling litigation in both state and federal courts. He served as an attorney for the Railroad Express Agency, Inc., in a suit brought by Montgomery Ward, Inc., and acted for the Reynolds Metal Co. of Longview, Wash., and Troutdale, Ore., in cases concerned with alleged fluorine poisoning.

The future of air cadets now enrolled or planning to enroll in advanced Air Force Reserve Officers Training Corps program is subject to continuous revision depending on the defensive need of the country in the light of world problems, Lt. Col. Merlyn McLaughlin said here last week.

Lt. Col. McLaughlin visited here on a nation-wide tour of 188 AFROTC units throughout the United States. He is representing the ROTC branch of the USAF headquarters in Washington, D. C.

The recent Congressional cut in air force appropriations has not made it possible to take as many graduates into the service as originally planned, he said. Under the present policy, all graduates commissioned by the air force must serve two years of active duty. For many graduates there is no room available unless older, more experienced officers are pushed out, the officer added. This is not advisable from the standpoint of national defense, he said.

To improve training for its junior officers graduating from AFROTC units, the air force installed a new curriculum in September. Under the new set up cadets will study military subjects only, leaving the teaching of all academic subjects to the educational institution. The change was made because of the short time actually spent by the cadet in contact with military subjects in the University, Lt. Col. McLaughlin said.
