College Makes Success Of Co-educational Dorm

Real Group Living

A co-educational dormitory which caused much eyebrow-raising when it was built is celebrating its first anniversary at Bemidji (Minn.) State teachers college. And so far there have been no mishaps.

Its users—who are quartered under the same roof but in separate wings of the structure—are all in favor of the co-educational idea. They meet each other in a lobby between the wings.

"It seems to establish a more wholesome point of view than if the boys and girls were chasing back and forth across campus," says one male.

"Teaches us how to live with other people and be tolerant," adds a coed.

And comments another male student: "We don't have foolishness like panty raids. Mutual respect develops when we see the girls on everyday terms."

Moderate Generation

College students drink, all right, but nowhere near as much as many have supposed. That's the conclusion of a 214-page report published by two Yale professors who've spent the last five years studying the drinking habits of nearly 16,000 students of 27 representative United States colleges.

Seventy-four per cent of the nation's students admitted taking a nip now and then, but more than 90 per cent proved to be very moderate imbibers. Students at "dry" colleges which outlaw alcohol ran up an average drinking score only six per cent below the national average, and they demonstrated that when they do drink, they get drunker than students at "wet" colleges.

The report also said students at women's colleges drink more than women at co-educational institutions. Most common reason given by the women for their drinking habit was that it helped them get along better on dates.

'Horse Heaven?'

The University of Kansas is defending its right to the custody of the sole "survivor" of Custer's famous massacre, a horse named "Comanche."

Comanche, now stuffed, stands in a university museum. But a Kiwanis club in Montana has started a fight to bring him back to the site of the battlefield.

"Horse heaven to Comanche is on the banks of Montana's Little Big Horn river," the club president wrote Kansas Gov. Edward Arn. "Most people in Kansas never heard of Comanche, and besides we understand the gallant gelding has been allowed to get dusty and moth-eaten in the Kansas University museum."

Countered the head of the Kansas zoological department: "We placed a special humidifier in his case just last year."

But He's Ineligible

"I happen to know he shoots a pretty good game of pool, too!"

Letters to the Editor

Multiplying Jerseys

Emerald Editor:

OSC's Mr. Keene, tracer of lost jerseys, has innovated something new in football jerseys at the cow college. His jerseys multiply like rabbits.

I am, of course, referring to the unfortunate incident which occurred after the Oregon-Oregon State football game of several weeks ago.

AIA Chapters Hold Combined Meeting

A luncheon, coffee hour and two reviews will highlight the combined meeting of the Oregon chapters of the American Institute of Architects at the school of architecture and allied arts Thursday from 11:30 a. m. to 5 p. m. Chapters participating include the Oregon, Southwest and student AIA's.

Norris Gaddis, assistant professor of architecture, will open the activities with a review of a service project in the architecture exhibition room at 11:30 a. m.

Luncheon speakers at the Student Union at 12:15 p. m. include Jean Stevenson, senior in architecture, and Marten Oosterkamp, graduate in landscape design. Stevenson will comment on construction and design at Aspen and Forest Hills and Oosterkamp will review architecture and landscape architecture in the United States and Holland.

The remaining activities are scheduled for the architecture school lounge where Joe Kahananui, senior in architecture, will review his terminal project at 2:30 p. m. An exhibit of work done by West Coast architecture schools at 4 p. m. will climax the meeting. Coffee will be served at the latter session.

Al Lauber, and Stevenson, president and secretary of the student AIA chapter, are in charge of the affair.
