Education School Changed

by Rodney Morrison
Emerald Reporter

Completely "off the beaten track" as far as campus buildings are concerned, and therefore only vaguely familiar to most students, is the education school.

Located southwest of the library, the building has, since last year, undergone dramatic, almost spectacular physical changes.

As far as organization is concerned, the school has taken the old University high school building for its classrooms and some of its offices, and has devoted its main building to adequate office space.

Much Planning

The construction and redecoration, which was done this summer, was the result of several months' planning on the part of the whole education school staff, with most of the actual work of planning being done by a committee of five people.

Miles Romley, associate profes-

of courses, called "methods" courses, in mathematics, English and other basic courses, has now been installed in the Eugene high curriculum.

Schoolhouse Brown Gone

Speaking of the newly-redecorated interiors of the two buildings, Dean Jacobson said "Gone is the schoolhouse brown," because every single room in both buildings is done in a pastel color scheme of two colors.

The central offices feature many windows and excellent lighting, both inside and out, and the arrangement is such that the whole group of offices may be viewed at once from several positions on the outside.

The faculty seminar room, a spacious, well-lighted room, features trapezoidal tables in addition to more conventional models. This room, like the others, is done in pastel colors.

Teaching Innovations

In the old University high building the newest in teacher-education has been used as an architectural and functional idea. Round tables and also rectangular ones, the style used in new primary schools, are used throughout these rooms, as well as movable cabinet space and work tables with indestructible surfaces.

The University reading clinic is located in this building, under the directorship of P. A. Killgallon, professor of education. In this section are many devices to test and improve reading skill and speed, among which is the reading accelerator, or "pacing" machine.

Graduate Lounge

Other features of the building are a spacious lounge for graduate students, which is adjacent to a workroom, also for graduates.

In one of the observation rooms, there is at the back of the room a section which allows the student teachers to watch the children without them being aware that they're being watched. For this purpose the booth at the back is equipped with sound-proof tile and a window which looks like a mirror on the outside.

The combination of a sister and a sweetheart, the Moonlight Girl of Phi Sigma Kappa, was selected by the fraternity last Saturday night. Chosen for the title was Joyce Bearden, sophomore in psychology.

Rifle Team Loses Wednesday Match

The University ROTC rifle team was defeated in a match Wednesday night by the Shedd Rifle club in regular Willamette Valley League competition.

Total scores were 951 points for Shedd with the University of Oregon team racking up 928. High man for Oregon was R. Buffington with a score of 190, followed by B. Kahalekulu with 183.

From the Shedd team two men tied for top honors with F. Simon and B. Schuman both shooting 193.

The next League match for Oregon will be with the Eugene Moose lodge, Tuesday evening Jan. 26, at their range.

sponding occasionally with the members of the class and will serve as the co-ordinating chairman in planning any future activities, such as reunions, concerning the class.

Also to be presented at the assembly are items concerning graduation and the duties of graduating seniors. Les Anderson, alumni secretary, will present this information and answer questions.

Lasker urges all seniors to attend the assembly and pointed out that there is no conflict of other assemblies or classes.

sor of education, served as chairman of the committee, and one of those serving in the group was Viola Volkins, office manager and secretary to Education school Dean P. B. Jacobson.

Faculty Helped

Other members of the committee were John P. Jones, Hugh B. Wood and Thomas Ballinger, all of whom are on the faculty of the education school.

These changes and, ultimately, expansion of office and classroom space, had been planned for several years, according to Dean Jacobson, but it could not be done until after last spring, when University high was removed.

Uni-high Thirty Years Old

University high, like the education school building itself, has been here for approximately thirty years, according to Dean Jacobson.

The way in which the two were connected was explained by the Dean, when he said that the education school had formerly assigned "most of their practice teaching at University high," but much of it was done in nearby high schools and junior highs.

The University owned the building, however, and the teachers there had the title of instructors on the University faculty. One group

Service Aim of Dads In 1927 and Today

"To serve in every possible way the interests of sons and daughters of members," the Dads' Organization was begun in 1927, with a small group of interested dads and University President Bennett Hall.

Now numbering approximately 3500 members the present Dads' Club has as its central organization an executive board composed of fourteen members.

The executive board meets four times a year, but the only general meeting of the whole Dads' Organization is during Dads' Weekend.

After the luncheon on Saturday of Dads Weekend, the group traditionally meets for a general discussion and business session.

The group has had fifteen presidents, including Gordon Wilson, the current chief executive. Wilson is from Portland.

Activities of the group, even though they are a comparatively loosely-organized one, are many. Most outstanding among their additions to the campus are centered about the Dads' Gates, at the north end of the campus.

Frequent additions to the Dads' Lounge of the Student Union in the form of furnishings have been made in the four years since the building has been here. They have also made other donations in the building.

One of the best-known projects of the club is the Oregon Dads' scholarships, presented annually to students recommended by the University's scholarship committee. Standards for presentation are need and previous scholastic record.

Extra revenue in the form of surplus dues is collected throughout the year and presented in the form of a grant to superior upper-class students, according to Karl Onthank, associate director of student affairs and executive secretary of the organization.
