Lindsay Cites Policy Change

"The big fact in the whole world is the revolution in American foreign policy in the past ten years," said Kenneth Lindsay, British author and statesman, at the coffee forum held in the Student Union Tuesday.

Lindsay, who addressed a University assembly in the SU ballroom at 1 p. m. endorsed the current United States policy of vigorous participation in world affairs. He stated that he would like to make clear to the people of Europe, the big strides America has made from isolationism.

He also discussed the problem of how the overdeveloped nations of the world are to live with the underdeveloped nations. He concluded that the nations like the United States will have to keep helping the underdeveloped nations.

More Controversy in Universities Encouraged by British Statesman

"There is far too little controversy in universities today, and far too many lectures," British statesman - author Kenneth Lindsay told a University lecture audience Tuesday afternoon.

"The trouble is that we're living half in the early atomic age and half in the late stone age, with some of our institutions belonging to the latter," he continued.

Speaking on "Politics in the Atomic Age: Challenge to Universities," Lindsay professor concern for the liberal arts education. Today universities "need overhauling," he said.

He emphasized the importance of human nature in education, saying that man cannot live by mathematics, logic, economics and political science alone. Judgement is difficult without the understanding of man, his nature and purposes, he told the audience.

Ideas Feared
The exponents of the "so-called liberal arts" fear new political ideas, he stated. Lindsay expressed the belief that we should try new experiments in international affairs. "Ideas matter, and the Russians know it," he reported.

"It is no good living in a political dream world. We must understand that other man's point of view. We must share our ideas and identify ourselves with the aspirations of others, according to Lindsay.

Only a university outlook, bred by a liberal arts education, is capable of molding life in the atomic age, he commented. Lindsay explained that the weakness and disunity in political and economic affairs have not kept pace with the technological advances.

Examples Given
"We can no longer afford political disunity," he stressed, as he gave four examples of this disunity: 1. the collapse of the European state systems; 2. the ferment in Asia and Africa; 3. the sudden rise and ominous power of Soviet Russia, and 4. technological advances which have increased the vulnerability of all nations.

He proposed that "we must learn to behave like democrats in an age that is not conducive to democracy," for the spirit of liberty seeks to understand. Lindsay expressed the belief that we must recover the sense of responsible liberty.
