

READY FOR WINTER

Condon Hall Improvements Rapidly Nearing Finish

Inside improvements on Condon hall are rapidly being completed and full use of the building should be possible by winter term, I. I. Wright, physical plant superintendent, disclosed this week.

Condon is one of the oldest buildings on the campus, and all three of its floors are being remodeled in order to provide more room and better facilities for the three departments which will be located there. Several classes of the geology, geography, and psychological departments have been relocated while work has been going on.

100,000 Specimen Moved

First change in the structure began when the University herbarium of about 100,000 specimens was moved into the architecture annex on Onyx street. Then last spring the Museum of Natural History was relocated in former physical plant shops on Onyx street. Included in this were many personal geology specimens from the collection of Thomas Condon, pioneer geologist of Oregon and one-time University faculty member.

Work was started on the basement floor during spring term and has since been finished except for a few fixtures. Work here was mostly refinishing geography and geology classrooms with new plastering, acoustical tile, and floor tile being added several places, as was done on all three floors.

The main floor of Condon hall has undergone the greatest changes with the space formerly occupied by the museum being partitioned into classrooms and laboratory space for the three departments. Some work is still left on this floor although it is nearly completed with a few classes already holding sessions there.

Work on the third floor of the building got started only recently and will probably not be completed for two months. No extensive changes are planned on this floor, but merely some general refinishing to provide better facilities for the psychology department, which will be located here when work is completed.
