Rabbi Nodel Lists Best Achievements

The greatest achievement of human life is not fame, money, or power, but the creation of a happy home, said Rabbi Julius Nodel in a Dads' room speech Wednesday night. Nodel spoke in connection with RE week.

The family has suffered with the growth of our industrial economy, he said. The rules and traditions which bound the family together were discarded when its members were no longer economically and socially dependent on one another. However, our newfound independence has not been compensated by a corresponding sense of responsibility.

"We are a generation of scientific geniuses and moral morons," he said.

If we could break through the crust of family unhappiness, he added, we would often find a case of love smothered by possessions. People must find happiness in things they can create rather than in things they can buy.

Modern living and tensions have become synonyms, Nodel said. Our individual and collective tension and speed make it harder and harder for people to get along. If enough people are not interested in adapting themselves to other people, individual futility will prevade our society.
