students are permitted, but they are subject to the draft until the age of 35.

House Approved

The House approved these two amendments by the Armed Services Committee:

1. Youths joining the National Guard under 18½ and serving until the age of 26 cannot be drafted in peacetime.

2. Men with six months' duty in the uniformed services or 24 months in the Public Health Service since Sept. 16, 1940, also would be exempt from the draft except in event of war.

Reserve Training

Meanwhile, a House armed services subcommittee took up another manpower bill. Backed by the administration, it would seek to insure that reservists keep up their training after completing their active duty. Another feature would permit 100,000 or so youths to volunteer each year for six months active service, to be followed by 9½ years of reserve training.

Uncertainties of the Formosan situation and the designs of Russia were in the background as the House debated.

Chairman Vinson (D-Ga) of the Armed Services Committee, successfully resisting a move to limit the draft extension to two years, told the House:

"Close to Shooting"

"We're about as close to shooting as has ever happened in the history of this government. In 1951, we had trouble in Korea. In 1955, we have trouble in the Formosan Straits."

In brief, the bill would continue until the middle of 1959 the government's authority to draft young men from 18½ to 26 years of age for two years of active duty, followed by six years in the reserves.
