

SURI TELLS STUDENTS:

'World Relations in Middle Of Great Transformation'

Our international relations are in the midst of a great transformation today, Surindar Suri told a University assembly audience Tuesday.

People's attentions are caught by the continual problems in the political and military picture, he said, but underneath, the work is moving toward peace and co-operation. The fact that we have avoided one major crisis after another shows this new trend, Suri said.

The major governments are forced to deal with problems on a day to day basis, he said. Under pressure to solve problems piecemeal as they come up, they have no time for effective long-range planning.

However, it is the duty of students, who will be called upon to solve the next phase of international relations, to prepare for what will happen a few years hence, he said.

The major nations today are approaching a military stalemate, Suri said. The important point is not that these nations have means of mass destruction, but that they are almost at the end of the possible development of weapons.

In the past, supremacy has been based not on the amount, but on the kind of weapons, he said. As major nations reach the ultimate in weapons, they can go no further, and the smaller nations will begin to catch up.

Fear Prevents Force

The fear of war under today's conditions of warfare has kept governments from using force, Suri said.

If the major problems of the world cannot be solved by force, reason, negotiation, and co-operation must work where force will not. If a nation is not equipped to use negotiation and co-operation, it will lose as surely as if it had been defeated in war, Suri said.

Force is continually being replaced by reason and cooperation in all our human institutions, he said. In local and national politics, and even in the family, people can no longer order, they must explain.

This new type of organization makes great demands on its members, Suri said. It is harder to explain and to reason than it is to order, he continued.

Reason Spreading

This new doctrine of reason is gradually spreading to the last area of force, international relations. It will be the most revolutionary because it is the last area to change, he said.

This change entails great problems, Suri said. To succeed, it must change the social system in the various countries. The teaching and thinking in these countries must change to fit the needs of the new system.

Already, nations are being thrown together more than ever before, he said. In the past, they could act as if their policies did not affect each other.

When conflicts arose, they were solved by war. This easy way out is denied to us, Suri said. It is not that we wouldn't go to war, but that we can't. The "life" instinct holds us back.

Alternative Difficult

The alternative of war is even more difficult, he said. Understanding and co-operation is complicated and strenuous.

The relations between India and the United States are an excellent example, Suri said. A minor, unpublicized cold war is going on due to a lack of understanding. Neither nation has anything the other wants, but each suspects the other, he said.

It is futile to expect understanding if both sides are unwilling to change some of their concepts, he said. If we are unwilling to change, we must expect tension and aggression, and we must be willing to pay for it in war.
