

'FEEL VERY SAD'

Visiting English Professor Sorry to See Churchill Go

By Joan Dennis Emerald Reporter

Kenneth Lindsay, a former member of Parliament, who is visiting professor here this term, said "I feel very sad that the old man is going" when hearing about the retirement of Winston Churchill.

However, the change of prime ministers will give the middle-aged Englishmen a chance to come into their own and to rule the country, he added. But he feels that there will be no fundamental change in policy.

Lindsay, a former independent member of the House of Commons, is teaching courses on the British Commonwealth and European Unity. He was a member of Parliament for almost twenty years, and held many appointive positions in the British government.

He has been minister of education, director of migration, founder of political and economic planning, founder of youth service, chairman of the national banking league and a delegate to The Hague and the Strasbourg conference.

He was a speaker at the University a year ago, during one of his frequent visits to this country. He has written two books and several articles. The latest is a comparison of European and United States higher education, and it appears in the current edition of the New York Times magazine section.

In England there is a tutorial system of education, and no lectures are compulsory. There are very few examinations, he said, especially at Oxford university.

"Education exists in context between one man and another," and therefore is on a much more personal basis than it is here. Each student reads an essay to the professor privately once a week.

Lindsay added that "The Americans are trying to face the problem of the twentieth century, which is trying to educate all of the twentieth century, namely, trying to educate all the people. The real problems of today are concerned with numbers, quality, and control."

Found in Junk Yard

NEW YORK—In today's era of streamlined, gaily colored cars, this 1916 Dodge sedan would cause a lot of stares and comment. It was once the staff car of General John J. Pershing. Here the vehicle is unloaded in New York City. (April 5.) Car was acquired by Daniel Parker of the Parker Pen company and he plans to keep it on his Wisconsin farm. Parker recently found the car in a junkyard in France.
