Pre-Frosh Fund

Emerald Editor:

When referring to the Emerald editorial of Tuesday, May 24, entitled "Both Barrels," an innocent reader may easily draw some false impressions and "hop" on a "bandwagon" that doesn't exist. Certainly this is a situation that needs clarification from the IFC standpoint.

First, we are not leveling "both barrels" at the University administration, we are simply attempting to adjust a rather untenable situation through sensible negotiation.

Secondly, there is no students vs. the administration "battle" existing and I'm sure that no wounds have been inflicted. The issue is not a "Heated" one, but simply another in the long line of student-administration discussion and well-planned action.

Thirdly, we do not feel the fund is unjust; we recognize the necessity of a Pre-frosh account but feel that we should not be one of the sole contributors to a fund that benefits the entire University.

Fourthly, the fund does work for the Greek organizations it represents. Without the assistance of the Office of Student Affairs, which collects and disseminates large quantities of Greek information, the Greek organizations would be lost. The Pre-frosh account finances a part of the secretarial work in Student Affairs and the Greeks benefit greatly as a result.

The solutions offered by the Emerald, then, would seem to be a bit hasty and founded partly on heresy. IFC does seek a financial adjustment and Student Affairs is now fully aware of this and is now working on possible solutions. Such adjustments require a well planned program which takes time. We're confident a solution will be reached that will satisfy the interests of both concerned groups.

Sincerely,
Kent Dorwin
President, IFC

On Bowling

An Open Letter to the Physical Education Department:

Why is it—though the University has on its faculty one of the very best bowling instructors in the whole country (this is not an exaggeration), someone else is allowed to teach bowling classes? Louis Bellissimo has been a top bowler for more years than he cares to remember; his four 300-games were bowled quite a few years ago. He has contributed feature articles on bowling form to several nationally-circulated bowling magazines; the latest appeared in March this year. And he is known by many current and past bowlers and bowling fans up and down the Pacific Coast for his enthusiasm for and over-all knowledge of the sport of bowling.

Bowling at the University has certainly benefited from his teaching. In spite of its remoteness from any area of serious bowling, Oregon, in the first three years of college competition, has twice won the Northern Division Championship and placed third the other year. Better yet, Oregon has finished first, fourth and second in national college competition. We on the team maintain that coaching, not talent, has been by far the most important factor in these accomplishments.

Contrasted with Mr. Bellissimo is the present instructor in the girls' classes. She is certainly a hard worker, free with her time and effort; and it was generous of her to take over Mr. Bellissimo's classes last year, when he was in the hospital. But enthusiasm alone cannot possibly compete with ability. It is obvious to anyone with even a fair knowledge of bowling that she is "in over her head." Due to her very limited knowledge of the game her teaching can be, at best, only confusing. Unfortunately it is harmful; girls who had hoped to learn to bowl have stopped trying in class, too perplexed to continue. Others have complained openly, hoping only that no one in the PE Department overheard them. It is for these girls that this letter is written; there seems to be no sufficient reason for the continuance of this sad situation.

INTERPRETING THE NEWS

Chances for Real Informality At Big Four Meet Grow Dimmer

By J. M. ROBERTS
AP News Analyst

Time-taking and a deliberate approach to problems are usually considered helpful in international affairs, but this doesn't seem to be entirely true of the projected Big Four conference.

It now appears that the meeting will take place even later than originally expected. Speculation that detailed arrangements will await the arrival in the United States of Russian Foreign Minister Molotov, who is coming to the United Nations anniversary meeting late next month, have been at least partially confirmed by Secretary Dulles.

Then, presumably, Molotov will have to return to Moscow for consultations in the Russian pattern, which frequently seem interminable. Under these circumstances the conference seems likely to be delayed beyond the July target date frequently mentioned.

This is not all bad. Aside from providing time for proper consideration of issues and the policies to be applied to them, there is a concrete impact of this period on international relations.

For instance, the best estimates are that Red China will make no overt moves in the Formosa Strait conflict while the conference is pending, lest they interfere with international Communist tactics.

If this is correct—and it is bolstered by the relatively quiet attitude taken by the Peiping regime lately—it contributes, along with the presence of the U. S. 7th Fleet, to extension of a period in which better solutions than war may be worked out.

The extended time interval between the suggestions for the conference and its probable convening, however, creates problems for the diplomats as well as time for deliberation.

President Eisenhower made a remark the other day which some might have interpreted as a willingness to interpret neutrality for Germany under certain circumstances. That had to be denied, and Secretary Dulles did so Tuesday, very flatly.

It is an example of the conference participants will be taking policy stands on many issues before they ever get together—public stands which will be very difficult to modify to meet counter-offers or counter-policy from the other side.

The business of sticking to policy at all essential points, yet maintaining sufficient flexibility to take advantage of any possible points of compromise, is always one of the diplomat's most difficult problems.

The original idea of an informal, top-level conference was to get away from that as far as possible, with the big boys just kicking the ball around to see where it might bounce. But it is now obvious that a lot of concrete is going to set before they even meet.
