Sinatra Gives Sparkle To 'Pal Joey' Musical

BY JOHN LENGEL
Emerald Entertainment Editor

Frank Sinatra is one of the hottest items around Filmville today. Producers realize that casting Sinatra in any type of movie spells good box office.

However, everybody concerned with Columbia's "Pal Joey" gets together to give its audience the old "run for their money."

The formula of a subtle and witty script adapted from the Broadway musical, plus the music of Rodgers and Hart, plus the heads up acting of Sinatra and Rita Hayworth, minus the efforts of Kim Novak, provides viewers with an entertaining evening.

Sinatra takes the lead as Joey Evans, a transient singer and master of ceremonies with a low slate of morals. His song style and stage presence add a good healthy punch to the production.

Big Time Detour

In "Joey" Sinatra tries to make the big time by moving a small-time dive in San Francisco's International Settlement into a swank night club surroundings atop the city's posh

Nob Hill. Joey almost makes it by "using" widowed socialite Rita Hayworth.

However Miss Hayworth is nobody's fool, in the script at least, and calls the whole show off at the last moment after seeing through some extracurricular activity between pal Joey, and chorus line anchor, Kim Novak.

We've seen the ending someplace before. A guy plus a girl with nothing but love—supposedly, is a very trite, shopworn ending to an otherwise creditable effort.

Hayworth Up

Rita Hayworth as the middle-aged socialite-widow comes through with an unexpected polished performance. It's nice to see Hayworth out of the stereotyped, pedestrian roles that dot her casting record.

Saint Better

Kim Novak slinks through her part as chorus bumper with the presence and grace of a horse. In a vocal, "My Funny Valentine," Novak glassily stares through a hollowed stage prop, murdering the lyrics with no quarter granted. This was a miscast. The role could have been handled much better by screen favorite Eva Marie Saint.

The film is shot for the most part in San Francisco. Technicolor and imagination on the part of the cameraman capture the city's charm. His use of interesting camera angles combined with some pleasant lighting effects, give the film an added gloss that many recent films lack.
