

CONTINENTAL FLAVOR

Movies Feature Foreign Locales

By JOHN LENGEL
Emerald Entertainment Editor

In "Paths of Glory," a Bryna production, a lacking military system, the bleak trench-like existence of WW I, plus a proficient Kirk Douglas are effectively molded into a powerful twelve reels of film.

Plaudits are due Stanley Kubrick, 29 year old director of the film. Although one of his initial efforts, Kubrick gives graphic evidence of his talent. In "Glory," he accomplishes wonders with grim realism, and detailed authenticity.

Kirk Douglas plays a front-line colonel who leads a doomed attack against a strongly fortified German stronghold. The attempted breakthrough seemed pointless at the outset, but was all the same ordered by a typical WWI "desk general." The plan fails miserably. To save face the desk general orders three men to be court martialed and executed for "cowardice."

From this point the show settles down into a violent protest against this routine sample of WWI French military justice. Douglas heads the defense for his three unfortunates.

Climax follows climax to give audiences a top show in all respects.

Monte Carlo Story
Marlene Dietrich and Victoria di Sica combine in "Monte Carlo Story," to give a pleasant, light hour and a half's entertainment.

Both play flat-broke royalty with only their titles left. They run into each other at Monte Carlo, and each mistake the other for being wealthy. The hoax is uncovered about mid-point through the film. When they find each other out they join forces and try to land a chunk of a touring American's wealth.

Everything ends well amidst a barrage of subtle satire aimed at the typical American tourist.

Brothers Karamazov
"Brothers Karamazov," is adapted for the screen from the Russian author Dostoevsky's novel of practically the same name ("The" was omitted in the film version).

Yul Brynner, Lee J. Cobb, and

Maria Schell, turn in fine performances in the film depicting vice, murder, and heartbreak, in a provincial town of Czarist Russia.

Cobb is the father of the four brothers Karamazov of which Yul Brynner is one. The pair actively compete for the favor of a stonehearted Russ beauty, Grushenka.

Brynner wins Grushenka, and deftly sidesteps the remaining sub-plots and counter-plots. The entire effort is applaudable, and merits attendance.

The Ball, which will cost $2.50, has been named "Senior Sayonara," and will last from 9 until 1.

Closing hours will be 2 a.m., according to Cowen, who added that tickets would go on sale soon in the Student Union and the Co-op.

Senate Okays

weekend. Dick Shaw proposed that the Senate declare itself to be in favor of separate weekends. This was passed.

Parents' Weekend 'Unwise'
Lynn Yarnell and Stan Scrivner, in their report on the Dad's Weekend, said that a Parents' Weekend would be unwise since the scheduling of the program and the staging of a parents' luncheon would be too difficult.

The two reported that the Weekend was successful but that more money will be needed for next year's weekend since the committee ran short this year. Scrivner said he thought the letter-writing contest was a failure and that the science show was a success. The two said that an educational exhibit should be planned for next year.

Conflicting Dates
They said the conflict of dates with the Winter Carnival was unfortunate, but ASUO President Jim Lynch pointed out that Portland State set the date for the carnival.

Lynch announced that the date for ASUO elections is April 30. The proposed Student Discipline Committee will be considered at next week's meeting.
