Niven Publishes College Calc Text

Ivan Niven, professor of mathematics at the University, is the author of a new text for college students described by the publishers as "one of the shortest calculus texts ever published."

The book, published by D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc., as one of the University series in Undergraduate Mathematics, is "Calculus: An Introductory Approach." In the text, the publishers explain, Dr. Niven "by concentrating on a small collection of central concepts . . . illuminates in less than 200 pages the ideas that lie at the heart of calculus." The text "strikes a sensible balance between theory and applications, and requires no background in analytic geometry."

NIVEN, a member of the Oregon mathematics faculty since 1947, was selected as the Earle Raymond Hedrick lecturer at the 1960 meeting of the Mathematical Association of America.

The mathematician's previous writings include "An Introduction to the Theory of Numbers," and a Carus monograph, "Irrational Number." He has also published many articles in professional journals.

A GRADUATE of the University of British Columbia, Niven received his doctorate from the University of Chicago. He has served on mathematical advisory panels of the Office of Naval Research and the National Science Foundation and is a member of many professional societies.

presented as a prime tenet of conservatism. At this same question period, a professor asked a question concerning the relation between conservatism and fascism, which created much heat and no light on both sides.

AFTER the period was over, the conservative ideal of personal freedom, so roundly applauded a few moments before, was completely forgotten by some of those present. "Boy, I wish I knew that prof's name; he sure was a dirty guy." "That nut should be purged from the University for things like that." Ideas as controversial as Buckley's must be able to give as good as they get.

The attitude that different ideas should not be presented, if carried to its logical extreme, would have prevented Buckley's appearance on campus to present his own controversial views.

Or are freedom and intellectualism reserved for the "true believers?"

HOME COMING

THE TRAVELERS THREE, Webfoots all, are back in Oregon—fresh from six months at the Shell Bar in the Hawaiian Village at Waikiki—better than in their student days at the U of O—and they were pretty better then if you'll recall.

That's Charlie Oyama on the left, Pete Apo, and Dick Shirley on bass. Drive up to the Ho-Ti Supper Club in Portland and join the homecoming. Come prepared—these boys are good! (P.S. the food's not bad either.)
