Fighting the Devil

Emerald Editor:

Bob Carl's column in Monday's Emerald shows a kind of frustration over contemporary problems of university education which is typical of our usual approach to current events elsewhere in our lives.

He feels that the premise most students support (try to work within present forms of democratic process) is "fine" and, in fact, "noble."

But he considers it unrealistic (and presumably unnecessary) to undertake a transformation of interests among "the apathetic masses of the student body." In contrast, I see the impotence that his view represents as an "unrealistic" attitude.

Students will "have an effective voice in educational reforms" only to the extent that they become well exercised in re-formulations which do, on trial, prove effective. Workable ideas have their origins in the minds of individuals irrespective of their status or present vested authority; and new frames for action are then constructed so as to give working form to such ideas.

The danger that impatience with democratic process brings lies in the probability that we will then re-assume the ancient, but paranoid, view of the Devil-in-History. The paranoid interpretation of reality is self-destructive both in personal and in social terms.

For example, in the present instance, Bob Carl's interpretation of events obscures several efforts to meet his concern which are now in process: (a) a periodical intended as a student-faculty forum for discussion of mutual concern is, I understand, now being considered by the Student Union Publications Board; and (b) motions designed with his concerns in mind have been under consideration for action by faculty members and their committees since the early part of fall term.

The energies of Bob Carl and, in fact, all of us, who have a common concern that forms of education be appropriate to the times, would be better spent in constructive resolution of conflict rather than in fighting the devil.

"Incoherent Dimeo"

Emerald Editor:

Every week I pick up your Friday edition and thumb my way to the entertainment page in the hope that Steve Dimeo, the entertainment editor, might be speaking coherent English this time. As usual my expectations are fulfilled — he isn't.

Polysyllabic words, sick puns, meaningless sentence constructions, and repeated and too often forced alliteration, coupled with an obvious fascination with verbiage for the sake of verbiage, gets tiring week after week after week.

So please, Mr. Dimeo, I plead — take pity on us poor pupils possessing only a pusillanimous percentage of polysyllables and a pooped-out potential for further pretentious puns and attempt to prohibit your profuse preoccupation with prestigious pedantry. In other words — speak ENGLISH!!!

with an opportunity to investigate the many aspects of the art of teaching.

● Our tutorial program provides an opportunity both for those who live on campus to participate in a worthwhile extracurricular activity.

● Since the average number of hours of tutoring per week required of each tutor is relatively small (approximately two hours of tutoring per week) those students active in other important activities also have time to become a member of the ASUO Senate Academic and Cultural Committee's tutorial program.

To be eligible for membership in the society a student shall: (a) Have no less than a "B" average in the subjects to be tutored. (b) Be under no scholastic condition or probation. (c) With few exceptions, have attained at least sophomore standing.

I believe the tutorial program has been successful in its limited stage, and as a result the Committee plans to expand the program. Certainly, this tutor project represents the fulfilling of an assumed obligation: to be of academic help to the students of the University.

lis the evening before. Charlie White took a tremendous verbal beating but he still showed he could play. He led the OSU attack with 20 points and kept the Beavers in the game until the end. It was a fine exhibition of basketball on both sides and a worthy performance to be appreciated from all standpoints of athletics.

OK, Duck rooters, let's go. You are on the right track. Improve what you have and support the Ducks even more. In the end the dividends will hopefully be returned in wins. The school's basketball program can benefit but help must come from the students.

The students have begun to show support—continue it. The team deserves the support and the coaching staff does, too. Good backing helps instill confidence within a team.

It's been a long time since the entire student body stood and cheered and clapped when the school song was played, and it's been even longer since they stayed and cheered at the end of the game like they did last Saturday.

Finish the season with a show of spirit. It could surely help make it a winning one for Oregon.
