

Buchanan Case Recessed . . .

withhold sources of information, even in spite of a court order.

Most of them said it would violate tradition to reveal the sources, although some of them said they could not cite specific canons of ethics or other written documents to back up the tradition.

Judge Leavy ruled several of Johnson's questions out of order, although the attorney was still allowed to ask them as an "offer of proof."

Frye maintained that the only question before the court was whether Miss Buchanan violated the court order.

Johnson argued several times that larger questions of freedom of the press entered into the case.

"You can't have a free press if you don't have freedom of information," Johnson said.

He argued that a ruling against Miss Buchanan "will tell the working press that if they are to use anonymous sources that they will either have to break that promise or be punished for contempt."

He said curbing her right to get information from anonymous sources would "curb the right of all reporters to obtain information in this way and the right of the public to learn about that information."

He also argued that Frye had presented no evidence that the information was "essential to the maintenance of justice" or that it could not be gained through other sources.

Johnson put Miss Buchanan on the stand for a brief period only.

She reiterated the five points on which she had refused to reveal the names of the students she interviewed: that it would breach the canons of ethics of her profession, that it would violate constitutional guarantees of freedom of the press and speech, that it would violate her privileges as an employee of the state of Oregon, that the inquiry was beyond the proper scope of the Grand Jury, and that she was not allowed to have an attorney present with her in the hearings.

Johnson also attempted to introduce evidence regarding a press release Frye issued on June 1, the day Miss Buchanan and three other editors of the Emerald were subpoenaed, but Leavy ruled it out of order.

Johnson attempted to introduce into evidence editions of the Emerald containing the paper's endorsement of Frye's opponent for the Democratic nomination for Fourth District Congressman, two columns which attacked Frye during the campaign, and Frye's response to those columns.

Again Leavy ruled them out of order.

In rebuttal Frye put Miss Buchanan back on the stand.

He asked her whether she volunteered the offer of anonymity or whether the students asked for it, whether she got the information because of the anonymity, and whether any of the students told her how to testify. Leavy ruled all those questions out of order.

She said she arranged to get the students together and agreed to protect her sources "to the best of my ability."
