

Experimental College Unlike Other 'Free Universities'

Editor's Note: This is the second in a series describing the Experimental College at San Francisco State College. The student-run and initiated Experimental College is sponsoring 75 classes for over 1,500 students.

Emerald Associate Editor

The Experimental College run by a group of students at San Francisco State is different from most other "free university" attempts.

Most free universities, like the Free University of New York, are organized outside of institutions. Not only is the EC part of an institution of higher education, but it has the support of the institution.

Therefore, college credit is available in most seminars for those students who wish it.

However, the Experimental College, itself, does not give credit for those classes which it organizes.

Credit Arranged

Those wishing credit can arrange for it through several methods.

The newest of these is the "77, 177, 277" series, passed by the Academic Senate last spring.

Through these course numbers in each department, a professor may form a new course, get the department's approval, and offer it through the regular college catalog or through the Experimental College.

Students Develop Course

Thus one person or a group of students may conceive of a course he or they wish to have offered, find a prof willing to sponsor it, and stick it in the regular catalog. Professors have co-sponsored courses with the Experimental College, and the whole class has received credit for the course.

There are also many options open for students through SF State's independent study program.

Last spring SF State's Academic Senate, where students have voting power, also instituted two more possibilities for experimental education.

The first of these possibilities are experimental sections of multi-section courses, which would apply, for example to the discussion section of a Western Civ or English literature course.

Teaching Departures Provided

Experimental departures in the teaching of courses currently in the catalog are also provided for. Here the only requirement is that the department chairman and the school dean be kept informed and that a record be kept.

There are many possibilities for student initiation and exclusive registration under this system.

Through special arrangement with the professors, students are also able to get credit through regular classes.

After registering in the regular class, the student usually makes an informal agreement with the professor that the student will fulfill some specified requirements without attending or doing the work regularly involved with that class.

With this method, a student may do outside work and receive credit for the course he is registered in.

Statewide Exhibit Given by Museum

"Have Art, Will Travel" — by land or air" might be the new slogan of the University Art Museum. Now in its second year of operation, the University's program of circulating exhibits is drawing enthusiastic response from all over the state.

Last year about 10,000 persons viewed 24 exhibitions in 14 Oregon communities. This year, plans are to nearly double the number of exhibitions, and to use an airplane for delivery of exhibits to outlying cities, according to Dennis Gould, graduate student in painting and manager of the program.

Formerly, many local communities were unable to provide art shows because they could not afford to pay for exhibits. Last year, with the inauguration of the federally-assisted work-study program at the University, a way was found. Friends of the Museum Association of the University Art Museum, agreed to pay expenses for the shows, and the program would be staffed by students who could qualify for employment under work-study.

Truck Delivers Art

A panel truck, purchased for the museum's circulating exhibit by the Oregon State System of Higher Education, traveled a total of 15,000 miles last year in order to deliver and recover art shows in communities in the western section of the state. Communities which are farther away will soon be able to have the exhibits flown in by a private airplane loaned by one of the Friends of the Museum, Gould said.

The main source of the shows is the University Museum of Art, which also provides the overhead and the experience necessary for implementation of the traveling exhibit.

Three circulating exhibits have been shown to date this year, and a fourth is now in progress at Mt. Hood Community College in Gresham, titled "Recent Acquisition of the Haseltine Collection."

New exhibitions which will be available to local communities the remainder of the year include: "Portland State College Faculty Show," (tentative); "University of Oregon Faculty," (tentative); "A New Look at Dante's Inferno," "Pacific Northwest Architects," "The Architecture of Pietro Belluschi," "Northwest Craftsmen," "Potters at Oregon," (tentative); "Painting With Silk," "Collages by Masatsugu Nagasaka" and "Fabrics by Jane Gehring."

What comes next? Possibly a somewhat more ambitious out-of-state program of shows and exchanges. "We've already had some requests," Gould said.

Girls' Pool Lessons Will Begin Sunday

The SU Games Committee is sponsoring girls' lessons in pool in the bottom of the Student Union beginning Sunday.

The lessons, which are free, will continue for approximately six weeks. All girls interested are invited to come to the first meeting at 4 p.m. Sunday.
