

'Conflicting Desires Split Viet Nam...

feeling a deep sense of partial alienation.

"For a man is both citizen and individual, and without both liberation and freedom he is only half a man.

"It is against the above background that one can appreciate the cruel fate which has befallen the Vietnamese people—a victim of the mistakes of the statesmen of the great powers, as well as the follies of their own leaders."

Both the physical war and the psychological war are being fought here at several different levels.

There is a struggle to build and destroy infrastructures in each of some 16,000 hamlets. There are squad and platoon-sized engagements between local guerrillas and government militia, called Popular Forces. There are terrorist bombings at luxury hotels and in peasant markets.

The Viet Cong are trying to build up troop concentrations while avoiding pitched battles in the rich Mekong Delta; government leaders, largely through the intermediate agency of U.S. Special Forces, are trying to win the loyalty of the Central Highland Montagnards, who are generally looked down upon by all Vietnamese, communist and non-communist.

South of the Demilitarized Zone, full-fledged conventional battles rage between battalions (roughly 1,000 men each) of American Marines and North Vietnamese regulars. "Pacification" cadres from one side or the other are at work in every one of South Viet Nam's 42 provinces.

The struggle has now spilled well beyond the borders of South Viet Nam and has become in effect a regional war. Anti-government activity is reported increasing in Laos, northeastern Thailand, and even Burma, while the Hanoi government claims North Viet Nam is about to be invaded.

Finally, the international political implications for the rest of Southeast Asia—from Indonesia to East Pakistan—are enormous. And, however Americans want to slice it, Southeast Asians see the two major protagonists—competing for power, influence, and the vindication of ideology—as the United States and China.

This, then, is your simple war. It is true that American warplanes are bombing and burning and killing civilians, more than you will ever read about in the papers. It is also true that the Viet Cong disembowel good province chiefs, or bad ones, and they do run prison camps under conditions not so far removed from those of Dachau. The only thing these two statements prove is that war is hell, and modern guerrilla war is worse than any other kind.

What is going on here has two sides, in every usage of the word. It is not just a slaughter of particularly innocent, peace-loving villagers. Nor is it a particularly democratic defense of freedom against terror and tyranny from without. It is a total war.

Kuwait Ambassador . . .

"Even the television is free (i.e., free of commercials)."

Kuwait television fare is sometimes like America's because the government stations run American westerns and adventure series. Even American wrestling and boxing shows up on the tube.

But a hefty portion is devoted to Arabic educational and public affairs programs along with Arabic movies and dramatic series.

"I'm proud to say that almost all of the announcers are ladies, which is quite a change for our country," said Al-Ghousin.

Has the veil been dropped from the Moslem country's customs?

"Practically, though not officially," he answered. And women have an important place in Modern Kuwait. As an example, the Ambassador said that when he was Minister of Foreign Affairs his two assistants were women, both graduates of Cairo University.

Kuwait students will no longer have to go abroad for a degree. The official ceremonies marking the founding and inauguration of study at the country's first university will be held in Kuwait (the capital) November 27.

In short, "Kuwait has come 200 years in 10 years. It would have been impossible without the money from oil," the ambassador said.

"Modern Kuwait's history goes back about 250 years," the ambassador explained to his dinner audience Wednesday night. "It fell under the rule of the Ottoman Empire and, beginning in 1899, was a British protectorate."

Kuwait's wealth in oil was discovered in 1951 and prosperity followed. Independence came in 1961.
