

Canada Said Trying to Stop Immigration Draft Dodgers

By JIM KIMBALL
Emerald Staff Writer

Is Canada clamping down on draft dodgers? A Canadian student peace group says yes. A Canadian immigration official has told the Emerald no.

Student Union for Peace Action (SUPA) in Toronto said in a newsletter: "It now appears that draft age men may not be able to gain landed immigrant status any more. Not because they will be refused, but most likely because their applications will not be acted upon."

SUPRA says "there have been several instances of people being quizzed as to their draft status at the border" and indicates that merely showing up at the border without going through the immigration Office will no longer work.

Contacted in Vancouver, B.C., T. R. Corbett, district admission supervisor for the Pacific Office of the Canadian Immigration Service, said his office's policy hasn't changed; it neither encourages nor discourages males who are evading the draft to enter Canada. It is not a factor because Canada has no draft law.

Corbett admitted that an applicant may be quizzed about his draft status, but that could not be the deciding factor.

He insisted that he does not know of any one refused landed immigrant status in Canada because he is trying to escape the draft. "It is not more difficult now to enter Canada." He added, "I know there are a number of people who have entered Canada to evade the draft."

The process of entering Canada is not simple. One must show he has the skills and ability to support himself once in Canada. After that he faces a medical test.

Deferment Policy Gets Reevaluation

PORTLAND (Special)—Male students may not be required to take 15 hours a term by their draft boards after all.

But they are required to complete a year's work in a calendar year and complete their education in four calendar years.

W. D. Purvine, president of Oregon Technical Institute, told the Committee on Finance and Business Affairs of the State Board of Higher Education Friday that he had been told that by Spargue Carter, director of the Selective Service System in Oregon.

Purvine said students would be allowed to make up deficiencies in number of hours in the summer if they did not take a full load during the academic year.

But Miles Popovitch, dean of administration at Oregon State, said Oregon State had had some students drafted with less than 15 hours.

"It's usually up to the draft boards," added University President Arthur S. Flemming.

to state a reason for refusing an applicant, nor is the decision appealable.

Corbett says "there is no basis for exclusion or deportation of anyone just because he is seeking to escape the draft."

If the applicant is OKed by Corbett's office, he still must clear the officer at the border. According to Corbett the officer has an arbitrary right to refuse admission to anyone, even if his papers are in order. However, such a decision may be taken to the Immigration Appeal Board.

The applicant must await the decision in his own country.

Corbett said he does have applications from males of draft age pending, but said he had no tabulation of the rate at which such applications are coming in and what percentage are being approved.

Volcanoes Topic Of Williams Talk

Howell Williams, who has done concentrated research on volcanoes of the Oregon country, will give a public address on volcanic eruptions at 8 p.m. Monday in 123 Science.
