

Committee . . .

reporting back to the faculty at its May meeting include:

● How will the P-N-P be connected with a letter grade, if at all? Will the standards for a pass be higher than a "C"?

● Should there be a limit to the number of ungraded courses taken during freshman and sophomore years so the students' options might be used up before they can provide the greatest benefit? Or would they be equally valuable in protecting the freshmen and sophomores against the harsh grades that might tend to flunk him out?

● Will this proposal be followed by a request that the number of graded hours be reduced from 150? And will students come to the ARC asking to have their individual requirement of graded courses lowered for graduation (say a student with 147 graded and 300 ungraded hours, as suggested by one member.)

Bollinger replied that "anytime you set up rules you're going to have someone ask for exceptions. In this case I would tell the student 'that's unfortunate.'"

And Dave McCloskey agreed it should be the student's responsibility to use discretion in taking the ungraded courses and not take too many too soon.

● Should the instructor know if the student is a "P-N-P"? On this issue, Bollinger and McCloskey, agreed to the affirmative, suggesting he might even ask at the beginning of the term who is taking it for a "P."

McCloskey pointed out that the class should be conducted just the same and the student should be required to do all the same work as students who are getting a grade.

Another question:

● How long should the student have to change from graded to non-graded if he changes his mind? The consensus was that it should be the same as that for either dropping or adding classes.

● Could a student take more than 36 hours for pass-no-pass? "Yes," was the consensus, "but not for credit." Only 36 of his ungraded hours would count toward graduation, though he could take as many ungraded courses as he wants.

● Would the option apply to graduate students? "Not this one," was the answer.

● Could an instructor choose to teach his course as strictly non-graded? "No," was the answer. The University requires that an instructor give grades in his classes. Even by accepting the P-N-P proposal, he would be giving a letter grade as well as the "Pass" or "no-pass." The letter grade would be kept on file.

In other discussion, Gerald Bogen, associate director of admissions, asked Bollinger: "If a professor has a point of view that grading is his best technique for teaching, then would you substitute the student's judgment for the instructor's as the best means of learning?"

McCloskey's reply was that "there must be a balance between the way the teacher can best teach his class and the way the student can best learn."

Clifford Constance, Registrar, said grades may be desired by freshmen and sophomores "because they want to see how they are doing in college." But then he suggested that they may be able to get an idea of their performance just by their grades on quizzes and examinations.
