

Controversy Studied on Show..

asked Lieuallen to explain what took place.

"Students were seeking equal representation on the presidential search committee," replied Lieuallen, "at no time did they interrupt or disrupt the function of Johnson Hall or the University."

Bruce, in an effort to examine administrative action at the University, asked Johnson to explain the recent controversy surrounding the freshmen living-in policy.

"The policy was established in 1953," said

Johnson, "and contains avenues of appeal." The administration of the University is still considering the issue, he said.

Sadler, speaking for the students of public institutions in the state, decried the controversy over the obscene handbill and the printing of obscene words.

"To think," said Sadler, "that a city the size of Portland, with its nudie flicks, topless go go's and dirty books, rises in unctious rage at a couple of dirty words commonly heard in a locker room is laughable."

Nolan, of Portland State, agreed that the situation had been blown far out of proportion. He blamed bias coverage of newspapers for conveying the wrong image of campus life in Oregon.

"There is a revolt on campus," Nolan said, "because students find conditions on the outside revolting."

Sadler, in summing up the case of university students in the state, said there "is no chance for a Berkeley situation in Oregon, unless we allow ourselves to be talked into it."
