

Federal grant enables center to alter study

The University has been awarded a five-year contract renewal for the operation of its Center for the Advanced Study of Educational Administration (CASEA) during the period of 1969-73.

The renewal could entail an excess of $3.25 million in federal funds, according to Max Abbott, center director.

Accompanying the renewal to be implemented there will be of a major shift in research emphasis from the "social context of educational organization and administration" to be the internal aspects of school operation and instructional change," Abbott said.

The center has been funded for the first year of the five-year period at the amount of $650,297 by the U.S. Office of Education. About $200,000 in University funds this year will complete the budget.

The general objective of CASEA's future work, organizational and administrative arrangements for the educational system, will accommodate rapidly changing instructional techniques, strategies and goals.

Abbott pointed out that the shift is not abrupt in light of the facts that virtually all educational decisions are controlled from within the organizational framework.

The American school will be unable to capitalize on emerging instructional patterns without fundamental structural and procedural change.

Economist named outstanding alum

A University economist, Corwin Edward, has been named one of three outstanding alumni of the University of Missouri-Columbia and was recently presented a Citation of Merit.

The presentation was made by the College of Arts and Science and the University Alumni Association as a part of Arts and Science Week at the University.

Edwards is a professor of economics at the University and has served as an economist with various government agencies. Most recently he was adviser to the president's assistant for consumer affairs from 1964-66.

Business students must pre-register

Students wishing to enroll in business courses spring term must pre-register before March 21.

Enrollment during registration week in courses that have not already been closed out will be on a first come basis. No priority hours will be observed. Only students who are pre-registered will be able to register early.

Students who have pre-registered for classes in business will still need to obtain a department stamp on their registration card. Their reserved place will be held for them for the first two days of registration week. After that time their place will be open on a first come basis.

OSU campus to help further the human rights movement.

The newspaper quoted Carr as saying: "Not all the athletic departments can be considered discriminatory, but discrimination does exist there as in many other areas of this campus and the city of Corvallis."

An investigation of the athletic department's treatment of the Milton case is in the formative stages at present. Department officials and Milton have been asked to submit reports to the newly-formed Commission on Human Rights and Responsibilities.

The Commission, formulated by OSU President James Jensen in response to the prolonged Black boycott, has been directed by the OSU faculty senate to take up the Milton case as its first order of business.
