

Nobel Prize winner lectures today

The 1967 winner of the Nobel Prize for Physics will lecture on "Science, Technology and Society" at 8 p.m. tonight in the EMU ballroom.

Hans Bethe, currently a professor of physics at Cornell University, has been concerned with relating the development of technology to the development of society. Bethe has served on several governmental advising bodies, including the President's Science Advisory Committee and the team which negotiated the cessation of atmospheric nuclear tests with the Soviet Union in Geneva, Switzerland.

Bethe was one of the scientists who helped develop the atomic bomb.

His main work, however, is concerned with the theory of atomic nuclei. The Nobel Prize was awarded him for his work on nuclear reactions, which lead him to the discovery of the reactions which supply the energy in the stars.
