

This issue:

Where can students go to get information about housing? What's there to do in Eugene? What are the new regulations for the Eugene Mall? How big is the University Library?

What really happened with the University's budget problems last year? What's that mean for this year?

What does the Oregon coast offer for things to do? How do you go about getting a parking permit on campus? What does the State Board of Higher Education do?

What new courses will be taught about women and ethnic minorities? What's in store for the football season this fall?

Answers to these questions and more can be found in this issue: the Oregon Daily Emerald's 150-page, seven section orientation edition. It is designed to introduce fall term students to the University community, what goes on, what's available and where to go for help if you need it.

Today's orientation edition is divided into seven general areas:

— Innovative education, explaining some of the more unusual educational experiences going on around campus.

— Administration and student services, telling how this University works and what kind of services it offers.

— Student government, showing the various ASUO agencies and programs, how they work, plus in-depth interviews with the ASUO President and Vice President.

— Community, explaining the structure of city government, how urban renewal is shaping the downtown area, several community services, and what to do in the city.

— Sports, with a look at the Oregon football season so far, and explanations of the intercollegiate sports, including basketball and baseball, and the smaller, participant intramurals and club sports. Also, two pages on women's sports at the University.

— Statewide recreation, telling what there is to do around the state of Oregon.

— Photography, being basically a visual, photographic look at the world around us.

All 150 pages of the orientation edition are designed to inform fall term students about the community in which they live. We hope it does the job well.

Obviously, we couldn't include information about everything in the University community, but we've attempted to cover most of the ideas, hassles, services and resources students run into.
