for their unusual features—that makes them far superior to ordinary channel setting. Delicate little beads, between the diamonds make them more secure—yet do not interrupt the brilliance.
The sides of the rings are smooth with no indentations or breaks. If you like the channel mounting you'll love these styles!

Nursing home volunteers to train

A training session for those involved or planning to get involved in volunteer nursing home work will be held Saturday in the Christian Church, 1166 Oak, from 9 a.m. until 3 p.m.

The session, sponsored by the Association of Geriatric Social Workers, will feature speakers dealing with problems of the elderly and "how-to-do-it" training session. These will include sessions on crafts, work with the bedridden, and how to throw parties and dances. A free baby-sitting service will be provided.

League sponsors Morse dinner

The Oregon League of Environmental Voters is sponsoring a dinner tonight for Wayne Morse, minus Sen. Gaylord Nelson. Nelson was to be the featured speaker, but Senate commitments will prevent him from coming.

The dinner will be held in the First Congregational Church, 23rd and Harris. Morse and William Unsoeld, who climbed Mt. Everest, will speak. Don Hunter, a local environmentalist, will show slides of French Pete, and folksinger Jon Hoffman will provide entertainment.

The group urges those interested in coming to make reservations. Tickets may be reserved by calling 345-4505 or 344-2931. They are priced at $3.50 for adults and $2.50 for students.

Lions hold hold Oktoberfest

The Eugene Lions' second annual Oktoberfest happens tonight at the Lane County Fairgrounds. Admission is $1.50 per person.

Oktoberfest will feature German entertainment, including a German band, John Klobas, games and contests and prizes for the best German costumes.

German food will also be served including beer, wines and bier sausage. I.D. will be required.

NASU abolishes...

The certain "stated objectives" the NASU wished the University administration to meet concerned the general objective of "retaining our rights of self-determination. . ."

"We wish merely to continue our efforts of self-help and self-education. The administrative 'progress' has continually plagued, burdened, and complicated our operation. We wish our staff to spend more time helping students instead of justifying our existence to the University, the State of Oregon, and the U.S. Office of Education," the letter said.

In the "stated objectives", the NASU said it wanted (1) "singular administrative responsibility," (2) the right to hire and "have final approval" of the program's director, (3) control over "all budget operations under our responsibility" and (4) the ability to "design our own evaluation system."

Gerald Bogen, University vice president for student services and who has responsibility over the OSS including the Native American Program, said Thursday night after the NASU's action that he still did not fully know the situation and couldn't comment on it.

Bogen had said Wednesday that the NASU's letter is being handled through the OSS director's office and that "It may be that the resolution (to the problem) has been reached."

The Native American Program members "are making certain claims," Bogen said Thursday night. "And I don't know whether they are valid or not. Caldwell, the acting director was meeting this week with Moses Bernabe, the acting director of the program, to try to ascertain their nature."

Vernetta Caldwell, associate dean for student administrative services and OSS director, has been out of town since Wednesday and cannot be reached for comment. (The NASU's Tuesday letter was addressed to Caldwell.)

Donald Rhoades, dean of student administrative services, was also out of town Wednesday and couldn't be reached for comment.

Bogen said Thursday night that he didn't anticipate any action or response by the University administration until the beginning of next week when Caldwell will be back in Eugene. He also said he did not have adequate information to take any action or make a response himself.

Bill Wyatt, ASUO President, could not be reached for comment Thursday night concerning the action by the ASUO-funded NASU.
