Reorganization investigated

The Eugene Human Rights Commission (EHRC) has decided to investigate the reorganization of the University's programs for minority and disadvantaged students.

The EHRC made the decision Tuesday night after hearing campus minority groups charge that "racism and paternalism" were behind the University's reorganization.

The reorganization plan calls for the replacement of the Student Educational Programs (SEP) by a new Educational Opportunity Services program. In addition, five existing SEP programs — SESAMEX, Project Life, Project 75, Project Continuation and the Native American Program — would be replaced by cultural centers.

Black Student Union (BSU) vice-president Hilda Benner told the commission the BSU feels the reorganization is a "resurgence of paternalism and racism" by Whites and forces minorities "into a position of complete powerlessness and invisibility."

Project 75 director Micheal Burch said University departments are also establishing more stringent entrance requirements for minority students.

Donald Rhoades, University Dean of Student Administrative Services, denied the charge Wednesday saying the University will continue its "three percent rule," a system by which disadvantaged students are waived regular admission requirements.

Rhoades also denied another Burch charge that the University is attempting to decrease the number of minority students on campus.

Burch also charged that the reorganization plan was drafted without suggestions from project directors.

Gerald Bogen, University vice president for student services, denied Wednesday that he, Rhoades and EMU director Dick Reynolds did not take into consideration the suggestions of the project when designing the plan.

The EHRC appointed its Minority Affairs Committee, headed by Bobby Edwards, to investigate the situation.

Board

votes to put change
on ballot

In an unanimous decision, the Co-op Board of Directors voted Friday to recommend the dissolution of the present cooperative system. In its place, the resolution suggested, a corporation should be established.

The board's recommended resolution stated that the present co-op system should be dissolved and replaced by a non-profit corporation with the cash assets and future surpluses being disposed through reduction in merchandise prices.

James Harrang, legal counsel for the board, was directed to prepare a ballot measure to be presented to the board members as soon as possible, reflecting the changes in the articles of incorporation and by-laws, necessary to implement desired changes in the corporate structure.

The board resolved that the ballot measure be proposed to the membership of the Co-op after due notification, at the earliest opportunity permitted by the present articles and by-laws.

A special meeting for members will be held at 3:30 p.m. Thursday in the conference room of the Co-op.

Participating in the Friday meeting resolutpon were Executive Board members Jamie Harris, president; Mike Doran, vice president; Barbara Aldane, secretary; Pieter Dykman, treasurer, and board members Marie Hartman, Carol Riech and Mike Hummel.
