Engineer shortage becoming serious

Add engineers to the list of shortages.

And put them near the top, says the dean of engineering at Oregon State University, (OSU) because the shortages won't be easily or quickly solved. Engineers will play important roles too, he noted, in overcoming some of the other shortage problems such as lack of power.

Dean Fred Burgess points out that the engineer shortage "is becoming evident already and will be serious by 1976." The reasons: declining engineering enrollments and increasing national needs.

"The manpower shortage can be predicted simply by counting numbers," Burgess states.

In 1970, there were about 260,000 students enrolled in U.S. engineering schools. That number has now dropped to just over 200,000.

In 1972, there were 44,150 bachelor of science degrees awarded in engineering. By 1976, the number will drop to just under 30,000—a figure that can be forecast with accuracy since all of these students are now in school.

"National manpower projections suggest that the nation's industries and governmental agencies will need 48,000 new engineering graduates in 1976. Put that figure alongside the 30,000 to be graduated and you get more than 1½ jobs for every graduate," he continued.

"The 1976 engineering graduates will find excellent job opportunities but 1976 employers will find slim pickings," the OSU engineering leader notes.
