middle income group is affected the greatest. They are caught by taxes all the way. They are moved to indentured servitude which could last the rest of their lives. This will have a marked effect on the incentive to go to school. The analogy of owning a car or house is not sound. They can sell the car or the house. They can never lose the loan. The alternative is the enlargement of work-study program which fits into the American ethic. If you get paid for work, then you will meet the responsibility."

Dellenback pointed out that concern about the elimination of work-study and grants is unfounded. "I've heard nobody talk of elimination of work-study. Don't feel that BOG will surmount everything else. There will be continued pressure to raise funding for BOG and to stop SEOG or have them melted together."

One of the advantages to BOG which Dellenback remarked on was that with a BOG the student could use it at any institution which filled his needs. "If the institution produces aid then the student will go there. With BOG they can go anywhere, whereas others are strictly institution directed." This would give the student more freedom. However the problem of adequate funding to all various programs of aids still exists, and with the addition of this new program, is even larger. "Why new funding for programs when others are underfunded. What are the priorities?" asked Anderson.

The commission was created to solve these problems of which programs are most effective and how they can best be implemented. They will be primarily concerned with 2700 collegiate institutions, half of which are public. These institutions serve 9 million students 73 per cent of which are in public schools. Also the commission will deal with a non-collegiate factor of 7,000 institutions, 12 per cent of which are public, serving 1.8 million students.

"We will be analysing current programs and breaking them down in view of nine objectives," said Dellenback. Student access states that students should be able to enroll in the institution most appropriate to his needs. The third objective is student opportunity which makes available academic counseling to help the student achieve his academic needs. The fourth encourages diversity and flexibility in educational programs offered. The fifth is a feeling that the institutions should strive for excellence.
