Smorgasbord for beginners

The Lichtenstein Circus returns this term

Whether you're interested in acting, directing a play or casting, Theater 199 could be of interest to you—especially if you're interested in all three areas.

A veritable smorgasbord, this class offers students interested in the theater a sampling of the many different aspects of theater production.

According to Jean Cutler, one of the instructors for the course, demonstrations and materials—live, electronic and mechanical—will be used to teach the class. Cutler and two other instructors, Horace Robinson and Jerry Williams, will teach most of the class "with specialists called in to cover two or three specific areas," according to Robinson.

The class will touch upon not only acting, directing and casting but also playwriting, costume and set design, management and lighting.

While the class will not attempt to give comprehensive coverage of those different topics, it will "attempt to teach enough so the neophyte student will know what he or she is interested in in the theater," Robinson said. "The class is an indoctrination course, designed primarily to be the first course a student takes as an introduction to the multiplicities and complexities of the theater."

"This class is also for those non-theater majors who want to know that much about the theater," he said.

The class, which will be taught in the University Theater, is scheduled for Tuesdays and Thursdays at 9:30 a.m. While the class will meet four hours per week, three credits are being given for the course because "we do not anticipate a great deal of text usage for the class," Robinson explained.

This is the first time this course is being offered but "it is not intended to replace the basic theater classes," Robinson said. "The course is meant to provide an introduction into the theater."

Students interested in taking the class should visit the speech table during registration.
