Users seek advocate

By JACKMAN WILSON
Of the Emerald

Relations between utilities and consumers usually go no further than monthly bills and last-minute payments.

James Carney, assistant dean of the law school, said Thursday that creation of a utility consumers advocacy organization would improve that relation.

Carney spoke to announce the beginning of a signature gathering campaign to create a November ballot measure that would establish a statewide, public non-profit organization to represent the interests of residential utility consumers before the legislature and the utilities.

"At the present time the only voice the consumers have is the Public Utilities Commissioner," Carney said.

The idea, Carney said, is to create a "voluntary organization, voluntarily funded" whose "sole function is to represent consumers" in utility and energy decisions.

Supporters of the initiative hope to gather, within two months, the 46,235 signatures needed to place the measure on November's ballot.

If voters approve the measure in November, they would be able to join the utility consumers organization for $3 a year. The organization would be managed by a board of governors comprised of one person elected from each state senatorial district.

"One of the beauties of this is that it will be outside the government," Carney said. "One of the problems with the existing system is that it's all in the government."

For their $3 yearly contribution, Carney said consumers would receive a voice in utility rate decisions, a consumer-oriented lobbyist in utility rate decisions, a consumer-oriented lobbyist in utility-related matters before the legislature and a "vehicle for communication on what's going on in the utility and energy area."

"If my instincts are right," Carney said, "I think there is a great deal of frustration about utilities." The way to relieve this frustration, Carney thinks, is to give utility consumers an organized voice.
