

Porter outlines issues, reaches for May congressional race

The Democratic nomination for U.S. Representative for District Four promises to be a tough battle. Charles Porter, a former U.S. Congressman, is challenging incumbent Jim Weaver in the May primary.

Porter spoke at the Lane Domo Forum Monday, outlining his reasons for running and the issues in his campaign.

"I believe the voters are entitled to a choice," said Porter. "I think it's a luxury that the Democrats can have a divided primary."

Porter feels there is a "difference in background and temperament" between him and Weaver, and that he has "more experience and morth strength in depth."

One important issue to Porter is reform of the FBI and the CIA. He regards the investigation of individuals by the FBI as "a waste of the taxpayers' money, but most of all, it has a chilling effect on free speech." He feels the CIA provides an essential service, but it "should act according to law."

"The real answer is in electing a president who has morals and won't let these organizations get out of hand," he said.

Gun control does not receive Porter's full approval, but he does support the registration of hand guns, a position he opposed earlier.

"I'm very conscious of the danger of a police state," said Porter, and added that he believes banning hand guns could be a step in that direction. But he says "registration of guns would not seriously affect our right to own hand guns."

Porter is a strong proponent of full employment and "tough, effective" tax reforms aimed particularly at the rich. He also supports election reforms to prevent the donations of "dirty money" to politicians, the nationalization of armaments and he takes a strong position against clearcut logging.

"I don't duck controversy, but I don't seek it either," said Porter. "I won't go along with what I think is wrong."

Candidate urges gun control

Urging the ban of "Saturday Night Specials" (short barreled pistols and revolvers) in Oregon, Republican candidate for State Attorney General, Lyndon "Tuck" Wilson outlined his campaign platform in a noontime speech at the University Law School.

- Requiring registration of gun owners and licensing of dealers.
- Limiting authority to issue concealed handgun permits to the state police.
- Requiring a license to buy ammunition.
- Making violations a felony.

Wilson's platform also includes making the Attorney General office non-partisan and initiating a statewide-supported program to compensate victims of crime through the State Workmen's Compensation system.

"Tuck" Wilson

One of three Republican candidates seeking nomination, Wilson is a Portland attorney who has spent 15 months as deputy to Secretary of State Clay Meyers.

His controversial stand on gun control has been met with surprise, skepticism and statewide attention, but Wilson believes that the time has come for "an unemotional look at the question of gun control." He does not propose to outlaw guns completely, but in addition to banning the sales of "Saturday night specials" he favors:

Stating that the capital punishment issue "is a red herring," Wilson instead concentrated on the problem of Oregon's current system of sentencing by which criminal offenders can obtain parole after only serving a fraction of their sentence. Wilson says one of the reasons for early parole is a result of serious overcrowding at state penitentiaries and other detention facilities.

"Perhaps we could confine the hardened convicts at the maximum security facility in Salem, while assigning others to regional facilities," he said.

Jackson predicts N.Y. victory in last-minute campaigning

(AP) — Three Democratic candidates, in the final countdown to another primary day, spent Monday trying to parley their pre-election predictions into post-election claims of success whatever the actual results.

Sen. Henry Jackson was in New York, where he has predicted victory as part of his strategy to sweep the northeast industrial states. Rep. Morris Udall and Jimmy Carter did their last-minute campaigning in Wisconsin, scene of today's other primary.

Both Udall and Carter say they will win in Wisconsin and polls there indicate a close race between the two, with the former Georgia governor holding a slight lead in the latest. Carter has said that if he wins in Wisconsin and finishes a strong second in New York, he could be unbeatable.

Udall, who has not yet won a primary, needs a victory in Wisconsin and a good showing in New York to begin overtaking the early momentum Carter built by winning five of the first six Democratic contests.

Ronald Reagan, meanwhile, began a tour of Texas as part of his Sun Belt strategy to wrest the Republican nomination from Pres. Ford.

Reagan, winner in North Carolina two weeks ago, did not campaign in Wisconsin, depending instead on the nationwide address he made last Wednesday. Aides say they do not expect him to defeat the President there. Ford campaigned in Wisconsin over the weekend and has predicted victory.
