Timber use subject of talk

By ARDEN SNYDER
Of the Emerald

Speaking on America's future timber growth and management, John Busterud from the President's Council on Environmental Quality (CEQ) said by the year 2,020, timber use will have increased 119 per cent. The demand will exceed the supply, he told a University group Wednesday afternoon.

Busterud defines the recent awareness of environment being part of the traditional, industrial role as the "new industry," one that makes expenditures and is accountable to the environment. He admits environmental interests often conflict with economic gain.

Concerning the use of herbicides, Busterud says he realizes the dangers of some such as 2,4-D, and he would not support their use. He was a contributor to the defense department's ban of Agent Orange (which contained 2,4-D) in Vietnam.

In looking at the forests from an economic perspective, Busterud, an economics major at the University in 1943, labels old-growth forests as "negative growth," and not as profitable as the "high-yield" new-growth forests. He encourages the use of private lands for timber growth.

In predicting the dangers and benefits of current timber practices, Busterud agrees that most environmental impact statements are inadequate in their guidelines on timber management, and their research is scanty. He calls them "an exercise in repetition," and accuses them of not being specific enough.

Busterud remarked on attempting clear-cut legislation, "We should crawl before we walk." He approves of the Humphrey Bill, which will place management of the forests in government hands and which opposes the 25-acre clear-cut limit proposed in the Randolph Bill.
