

Quinlan breathing on her own?

DENVILLE, N.J. (AP) — Karen Ann Quinlan has stayed alive without the aid of a respirator for several days, NBC News and the Morris County Record reported Sunday.

A spokesman for St. Clare's Hospital here and the attorney for the comatose woman's parents refused to verify or deny the reports that she was removed from the machine that has kept her breathing after she went into a coma more than 13 months ago.

They also would not confirm the newspaper's report that Quinlan, 22, was moved from the intensive care unit to a private room Saturday.

The hospital would say only that her condition remained critical.

The woman's parents won permission from the state Supreme Court March 31 to disconnect the machine and allow her to die if a hospital ethics board certified her condition as hopeless.

NBC said weaning Quinlan from the respirator was a way of bypassing the requirement for an ethics board decision.

The network said Quinlan's removal from the respirator did not necessarily mean her condition had improved. In a trial last October, physicians testified that Quinlan could live for several days if she were weaned from the machine.

The family attorney, Paul Armstrong, said the news reports were "ill-informed" and based on "thoughtless speculation," but he would not say if they were substantially correct.

"Information about Miss Quinlan's medical condition remains within the sacred realm of the family," he said. "That fact is immutable."
