

Open as the wilderness . . .

The Outdoor Program is as open as the wilderness it pursues — no membership, no dues, no rules, no restrictions for participating. It merely coordinates a host of outdoor activities such as hiking, climbing, rafting, canoeing, kayaking, cross country skiing, and bicycling. Many of the trips are instructional, although some are downright tests for those claiming to be experts.

All activities originate from volunteer interest, and the program charges no costs besides transportation, food and equipment expenses. The group process, rather than authoritarian leadership governs all activities. Consequently, self responsibility and common sense are key requirements for participation.

To find out what activities are going on throughout the summer, check the program's activities board in Room 23, EMU (in the basement) or call 686-4365. Activities are also listed in the program's bi-yearly publication Cooperative Wilderness Adventures/Free Country Times.

Some of the major events planned for this summer are kayaking and rafting in the North Cascades National Park, July 11-16; bicycling on Smith River Road, July 30 to Aug. 2; and river rafting and clean-up on the Salmon River, Aug. 23 to Sept. 3.

A new interdisciplinary program on wilderness between the Outdoor Program and the University's honors college is starting up this summer. It is designed for the formal study of complex, wilderness-related, ecological, socio-economical, recreational, political and historical issues. Students may participate in some of the program's activities while developing special projects for credit in selected academic departments.

An informal meeting for students interested in the wilderness curriculum will be held Tuesday in the EMU at 7:30 p.m., room to be announced. by Martha Bliss
