

'What? — No index?'

A questionnaire will be placed at various points in the University general library this week to find out how students are adjusting to microfilm cataloging, according to Jim Dwyer, a library instructor and cataloger.

The questionnaire should help the library determine if students are having problems, what the problems are and what they can do to alleviate those problems, says Dwyer.

Students were probably surprised to walk into the library this year and see the microfilm readers set up. If students were in the reserve reading section, they had no choice but to use the readers.

Elaine Kemp, head catalog librarian, said the library has been having its cards made into microfilm since July, 1975.

The microfilm was then made into microfiche, which is a computer output of microfilm. This means all the computer-processed material can now be updated more efficiently and more quickly, according to Kemp.

"It is a way of utilizing technology to eliminate routine jobs. These people can now spend their time assisting the public," Kemp said.

The microfiche readers are located in the social science, humanities and education psychology divisions and the reserve reading section of the main library, and also at the architecture and allied arts library, the science library and the law library.

Each station has an author, title and subject catalog. The basic catalog is a photocopy of what was available in the spring of 1975, and there is also a supplement which contains corrections for the main catalog and additions to it. The supplement is revised every two weeks.

A four-letter index marks the corner of each card. Students are having problems as a result of the index system, Kemp acknowledges. Therefore, the library is presently revising its system for more convenient use.

THE WIZARD OF OZ
We have all had the opportunity to journey down the Yellow Brick Road with Dorothy and her companions many times in the past years, but rarely do we have the chance to do so with the benefits of a full screen, brilliant color, and no commercial interruptions. The difference in the quality of the picture with these added factors is mind-blowing. It's a beautifully sentimental experience that can't be topped.
