Sacred Heart library closes doors to students

University students can no longer use the Sacred Heart General Hospital Library under the terms of a University Library and Sacred Heart policy statement, according to H. William Axford, library dean.

The policy is not new, but the increased use of the hospital's library by University biology and life-science students necessitated the announcement of another policy statement. In 1973 approximately 600 students used the library and in 1977 almost 1,500 students used the library, the dean notes.

Students are encouraged to go to the Education-Psychology section of the University Library and the Science Library instead of Sacred Heart. The Science Library as well as Sacred Heart, has available "Medline," a medical data computer search service.

"The Sacred Heart Library is a private library and has no responsibility to serve University students," Axford says. "Our needs are provided by the state and legislative decisions."

However, if students exhaust all other resources, Sacred Heart's library may be used by students who have received a written request from a University librarian, says Axford.
