Straub energetically protects residents

PORTLAND (AP) — Gov. Bob Straub said Tuesday if the Northwestern states don't begin moving toward a regional energy program, Oregon may act alone to protect its citizens.

Straub said the 1977 Legislature approved a Domestic and Rural Power Authority (DRPA) that "gave Oregon the bargaining lever we needed to demand our fair share of the inexpensive federal hydropower generated in our region."

DRPA would, in effect, be a statewide public utility that supposedly would qualify for a share of the federal hydropower distributed by the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA). Local public utility districts, most of them in Washington state, now have preference for the federal electricity.

Under the legislation, DRPA won't come into existence until March 1, 1979, because "we thought with a little time, a regional plan would develop that would give us equity in utility rates with our northern neighbors in Washington," Straub said.

"But," he added, "it seems that no satisfactory progress is being made in the regional negotiations. If this stalemate continues, I will not hesitate to call a special session of the Legislature to bring DRPA on line as soon as possible."

Lutheran choir to sing concert

The Pacific Lutheran University Choir of the West will perform a two-year choral concert with a chamber orchestra at Beall Concert Hall at 8 p.m. tonight.

Directed by Maurice Skones, the concert is sponsored by the South Eugene High School and the University. Admission is $3.

Straub noted electric rates in Oregon are more than twice as high as those paid by Washington residents. Most Oregon consumers, served by private utility companies, no longer have sufficient access to federal power.

A similar situation exists in Idaho and Montana, and Straub said the concept of DRPA "is becoming so attractive the governors of those states are planning to submit DRPA's of their own to their legislatures."

Straub spoke at an Energy and the Consumer conference sponsored in Portland by the Western Environmental Trade Association.

Straub also said he was told by BPA Administrator Sterling Munro the Oregon state government might receive interruptible power from BPA for use in state buildings and highway lighting.

Interruptible electricity is surplus to BPA's firm commitments. It is sold — mostly to such industries as aluminum plants — at very low rates, but may be curtailed whenever it's needed elsewhere.

Straub said a supply of interruptible power could save the state about $2.4 million a year.

"The only problem is that when that power is cut off to meet other BPA commitments, it's going to get awfully dark in some of our buildings," Straub said.

The trade association is a coalition of business, industry and labor that was formed to bring economic considerations into environmental issues.

During the daylong session, which drew about 125 people, interests ranging from newspapers to farmers to hospitals discussed the impact of energy shortages and rising prices on their operations.
