Begin blasts plan to sell Egypt arms

Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin said Wednesday a U.S. decision to sell jet fighters and other arms to Egypt would be a negative development in the Middle East peace effort.

"Let's hope such arms supply will never take place," Begin told a news conference in Geneva, Switzerland, where he is on a three-day fund-raising mission.

Pres. Anwar Sadat has asked the United States to supply him with arms, including jet fighters. But the Egyptian president ended his talks in Washington on Wednesday with no indication from President Carter whether the sales would be made.

Administration officials said it would take about two weeks for Carter to reach a decision.

Israel's deputy defense minister, Mordechai Zippori, said in Jerusalem that Israel will "mobilize all our friends" in the United States to prevent the sales to Egypt. He told the Israeli parliament Wednesday that weapons sold to Egypt could be used to fight Israel and "under these conditions we certainly cannot close our eyes."

The United States leveled new criticism at Israel for sending settlers into occupied Arab lands.

"Further settlement activity would be inconsistent with the effort to reach a peace settlement," the White House said after a final meeting between Sadat and Carter. But the statement reaffirmed the U.S. position that "the United States will remain faithful to its historic commitments to the security of Israel."

Israeli state radio said settlers were preparing to move into a new site in the occupied West Bank of the Jordan River. It said mobile homes were being moved to Tel Haris, about 10 miles inside territory occupied by Israel since the 1967 war.

A spokesman for the settlers said no date had been fixed for the move, but the government has promised it will be soon.

Tel Haris is one of three new settlements the government approved last month, provoking a series of sharp messages from Carter.

Foreign Minister Moshe Dayan said in a speech to U.S. Jewish leaders in New York that Israel will not give up settlements on Arab lands and will continue to build three new settlements on the West Bank.

"In the near future we promise we will not establish any new settlements outside of military camps," he said. "However we won't remove existing settlements."

In another Mideast development Wednesday, a battle at a Lebanese army barracks outside Beirut intensified into a major confrontation between Syrian soldiers and Lebanese Christian forces in the capital. A cease-fire was agreed upon after 12 hours of heavy fighting, but sporadic firing was heard after it took effect.
