Know the candidates

Every time you step into that voting booth to cast a vote for a political candidate, you're voting for someone you think will represent your opinions in public office. And every election, the Emerald interviews candidates for all offices with questions geared toward delving into the beliefs of candidates on issues close to home — environmental issues, energy issues, higher education issues, state issues, national issues and local issues.

This elections supplement contains the results of those interviews. Editorial endorsements have already begun on the editorial page, and they will continue today and Monday. This election, as all elections, sets people of a variety of interests before the voters, who will decide with their votes which candidates will be elected — and indeed which direction the state will go on a myriad of issues.

We hope you will consult this guide and other sources of information so that when you step into the booth to hold the ballot punch, you'll know for sure which candidate you want to see in office.
