

Low funds still plague drug center

By MIKE RUST
Of the Emerald

The Drug Information Center raised almost $2,000 in a jog-a-thon last month, but the center's financial problems are far from solved.

Although no specific figures are available, program manager Joe Coss says the center needs to raise more money by the first of next year to keep staff positions from being eliminated.

"We've never been able to generate enough funds to cover all of the positions," Coss says.

But Coss says contracts are being negotiated with state agencies, such as the State Mental Health Division, and with other Oregon counties. The DIC is already providing services to other counties because of its policy of not turning anyone away.

"The center could serve three or four counties on a regular budget of $70,000," Coss says. "Another $20,000 to 25,000 and we would be able to serve the state."

The DIC provides many services for both the University and the community as a whole, including telephone and walk-in facilities; drug identification and educational services; and a library and publications.

The University currently allocates the center $20,000 annually, along with a house and bookkeeping services.

Another $30,000 comes from both state and Lane County grants, while around $20,000 annually comes from grants from the ASUO and school district 4-J, as well as from service fees and fund-raising activities.

Last month's jog-a-thon was held at Hayward Field, where participants ran for an hour.

"More than 50 people showed up and they ran their hearts out," DIC Director Mark Miller says. "Some people ran more than 40 laps in one hour and that's just amazing."

Additional fund-raising events will "definitely" take place in the future, Miller says.
