Bookstore board initiates Nestle info plan

By MARK MATASSA

The University Bookstore will not remove Nestle products from its shelves.

Instead, the bookstore board of directors voted Tuesday to post signs informing customers of a recent student body vote endorsing the boycott of Nestle products.

Jess Barton, chairer of the Student University Affairs Board, endorsed the bookstore board's action. Barton has actively argued in favor of the boycott.

"This is a workable compromise," Barton said. "I can understand certain student's rights to make their own choice (regarding the boycott). Your motion provides a choice, yet it provides information about the boycott."

Bob Lang, a faculty member of the bookstore board, also spoke in favor of the motion. "This is a much stronger and more effective way of reminding people of the boycott than simply removing items from the shelves."

The motion, made by faculty member Muriel Jackson, included posting addresses of Nestle Inc. and INFACT, a group supporting the boycott. Board member Hal Darst wanted to include information on the reasons for the boycott, but his motion to amend was defeated 5-2.

The vote on Jackson's original motion was 6-0, with Darst abstaining.

An unidentified spectator at the meeting said she was disappointed the public was not informed about the board's intention of dealing with the Nestle issue at the meeting. She said she was not prepared to speak against the issue.

Before dealing with the boycott question, the board postponed hearing a proposal which would create a policy on public input at board meetings.

Jackson submitted the proposal on behalf of a committee formed in April to formulate a public input policy.

The committee's four-step procedure would include submitting written notice of the topic for board consideration and a board vote on whether to consider the topic further. If the board decides to pursue an issue having "monetary impact on the Bookstore," the person or group submitting the proposal would have to gather signatures from 10 percent of the bookstore membership, or about 2,000 signatures.

Darst said he objects to the proposal, which he says limits access to the board instead of encouraging it.

"I'm surprised the board would even consider this very restrictive process that limits input," he said.

Board member Andy Vander-molen said the 10-percent figure is excessive. He said with only 333 students voting in the last election, it would be unfair to require 2,000 signatures before discussing an issue.

Jackson said the proposal was made in an effort to divorce public issues from ordinary business. But after Darst and Vander-molen raised objections, Jackson suggested sending the proposal back to committee to work out a compromise.

The board voted unanimously to table the motion.

In other business, the board gave bookstore manager Jim Williams authority to continue negotiations with architects and contractors on a proposal to remodel part of the store.
