Two months ago a new business opened in Eugene — a counseling service that for $35 an hour promises to unlock each person's ability to get what they want from life.

Khalsa Counselors offers students in particular an avenue along which they can achieve high grades, healthy relationships and financial bliss, according to Clark Harris, one of the business's four founders and a University student.

Harris hopes to hold free weekly meetings on campus to demonstrate the capabilities of Khalsa counseling.

He first became involved with Khalsa counseling after finding the techniques worked well for his friends.

Harris and three of his friends constructed their business from a skeleton of Eastern thought and Indian religion fleshed out with Western psychology, modern personal communication techniques and California-style capitalism. Harris says this amalgam can provide a key to individual success.

Their principle source of guidance comes from the Sikh Dharma religion of India as enunciated by Yogi Bhagan stumbling blocks of their clients and then teach them: new ways to look at life.

Along with hypnosis, they use Neuro-Linguistic Programming, Life Pattern Analysis and Therapy, and biokinesiology.

The final goal of these and their numerous other techniques is to "enrich people, so that they have the self-trust and creativity to create the futures they want," he says.

in making a profit, he says. He once swapped an artist a painting for some counseling while riding there.

"Everything is profitable. 'Money is the symbol of prosperity,'" he says. "How much can you give yourself on a material plane? Happy people will have the money they want."

As Khalsa literature describes it, "You will experience more money and prosperity..." Harris says several of his clients have experienced a threefold increase in income since attending his counseling sessions.

However, money is no panacea, Harris warns.

"It's not the key to financial problems. It's the creativity goals you set. Money is just paper."

Even though The Prosperity Group is preoccupied with profit and money, Harris says it is probably different from EST and other achieving-your-potential groups because it is based on a "God-consciousness."

He says their therapy is not self-centered. "We are helping society as a whole by doing our part in improving the consciousness of people."

to live by.

In one method, the counselors ask clients to imagine scenes that cause them distress and simultaneously touch them in a specific place.

Next the clients are asked to imagine a scene where they felt confident and are touched somewhere else. The counselors then ask the clients to recall the initial distressing scene and touch them in both places simultaneously.

Harris says this "anchors" the feeling of confidence to the distressing image in the client's subconscious and thereby provides a new way of perceiving old problems.

By getting a person to look in a different direction while recalling some bad experience, the counselors can change that person's thoughts from feelings to images or from images to feelings.

Harris says he helps support his own consciousness with one of his own techniques — an affirmation.

"I, Clark, am willing to allow more bliss, love and money into my life."

'Anywhere I go I think in terms of making a profit.'

(pronounced BUH-gin). Bhagan, who moved from India to America in 1969 and now lives in Los Angeles, teaches the counselors, Harris says.

"Yogi Bhagan has given us the goal of the whole production. He has given the philosophy: Within each one of us, we have the potential to achieve unlimited prosperity. All that it really takes is self-trust."

To bring their clients within striking range of unlimited prosperity, the counselors sort out the specific goals and emotional

More money is a high priority for many Khalsa clients, Harris says. In response, Khalsa Counselors created The Prosperity Group, a seminar designed to help solve financial problems with prosperous thinking.

Harris explains how he thinks prosperously, "Anywhere I go I think in terms of making a profit. When I fly to Dallas, I go first-class because that's where the people with money sit."

Jones fund buys library materials

A William Jones Memorial Fund has been established at the University, honoring the former acting president of the institution.

Created by his wife Helen and friends, the memorial will provide funds for acquisition of library materials in political science and public administration, according to Douglas Wilson, executive director of the University Foundation.

"The University is grateful that this fund has been established to aid the library," Wilson said.

"Development of private support for the library is an important University priority"
