One week after the NCAA voted to include women's athletics in its governing structure and sponsor women's championships, the move is still raising eyebrows and questions about the "new" direction of women's athletics.

No one is certain what will happen or how soon, but at the University, coaches and administrators agree it is only time before Oregon moves from the AIAW to the NCAA.

"It's a matter of economics," says Deputy Athletic Director Julie Carson. "We can't really afford to join, and we can't afford not to join."

The economic implications of the NCAA maneuver are the most far reaching and possibly the most devastating to economically straddled athletic departments.

Coupled with the NCAA's traditional stance against women's athletics, especially the organization's opposition to Title IX, women are caught in quite a dilemma.

The economic implications present the biggest challenge for athletic departments. To maintain Division I-caliber women's programs, athletic departments will be forced into the NCAA's recruiting game.

If they don't join up, they won't have the top athletes, since AIAW recruiting rules don't allow off-campus recruiting. NCAA rules do.

The University and Oregon State University feel this acutely. Both schools support top women's programs, sending teams to national championships and national tournaments each year. To support this habit they need top caliber athletes.

By being rescued from the dark ages, women have been forced into the recruiting mode that men have grown to despise and women have tried to avoid. As the rules stand now, women's coaches can't even talk to a recruit away from campus or visit their high school.

Under the NCAA, all that will change.

"I don't relish the thought of camping out on a recruit's doorstep," says Oregon women's basketball coach Elwin Heiny.

While women's athletics won't require the recruiting megabucks that football demands, it takes lots of cash to send coaches on the recruiting trail.

NCAA officials have said they will pay for a team's travel expenses to its national championships. The AIAW is financially unable to.

"That has to be taken into consideration," Carson says. "We're sending four or more women's teams to national tournaments each year. A cheaper way of supporting national championship teams has to be found."

The NCAA has offered a cheaper way, but the offsetting costs for recruiting will add several thousand dollars to the women's athletic budget, Carson says.

A majority of the University's women's athletics coaches want to go with the NCAA, Carson says, "but we can't afford it. We're caught between what we want to do and what we can afford to do."

"A lot of other schools will be in the same place — caught between dreams and reality."
