ask the sexpert

Since I began using a diaphragm, I haven't been lubricated enough during intercourse. Does a diaphragm block lubrication?

First, let's look at where vaginal lubrication comes from. The main source of lubrication comes from the walls of the vagina. The vaginal walls "sweat" droplets of mucoid material, which eventually coat the entire vagina. This sweating action is an almost immediate response to any form of sexual stimulation. Two other very minor sources of lubrication are Bartholin's glands (located just outside the vagina) and cervical mucous, when present.

It is doubtful that your diaphragm is blocking lubrication. The diaphragm only covers the cervix and a small portion of the upper vagina. The small amount of mucous blocked by the diaphragm should not make a noticeable difference. Sometimes insufficient lubrication can be caused by tension or nervousness about lovemaking. If you just have started using a diaphragm, and feel self-conscious, this could result in tension and dryness. Once you feel more comfortable about using your diaphragm, your lubrication should increase. Meanwhile, you might try an additional lubricant, such as K-Y jelly. Be sure to check the label. It will state whether it can be used with a diaphragm. Never use vaseline with a diaphragm or condom. It will deteriorate the rubber.

Lately I have been very depressed for no reason, and a friend told me it was because I stopped taking birth control pills. Is there such a thing as "pill withdrawal"?

Yes, some women do experience side effects after discontinuing birth control pills. Your body is simply adjusting to the change in hormone levels, just as it did when you began taking the pill.
