

University, Germany exchange profs

A professor from the University of Tubingen will teach at the University during spring term and two University professors will teach in German universities in early summer through an exchange program between the state of Oregon and the German state of Baden Wurtemberg.

The exchange of American literature professors is the first trade of faculty members under the decade-old program. Previously, only students and resident directors have participated in the exchange.

Alfred Weber of the University of Tubingen in southern Germany, will teach a seminar on Nathaniel Hawthorne in the English department and a course on the poetics of the short story in the Honors College.

George Wickes, head of the English department, will teach seminars on William Faulkner, Ernest Hemingway and contemporary American narrative at the University of Tubingen. Louise Westling, visiting assistant professor in the Honors College, will teach seminars on women writers from the American South, including Maya Angelou, at Tubingen and the University of Stuttgart.

German Prof. Edward Diller currently is the director of the Oregon Study Center at Stuttgart.

In a separate program, Germanic Languages Prof. Wolfgang Leppmann will teach courses in contemporary German history and literature during the 1982 winter term at a study site in Cologne, West Germany.
