

Cecil Andrus will speak on natural resource future

Former Secretary of the Interior Cecil Andrus will speak tonight at 7 p.m. in the EMU Ballroom on "The Future of Our Natural Resources" as part of Earthweek festivities.

As interior secretary under the Carter Administration and former governor of Idaho, Andrus consistently advocated conservation. He worked to implement a new approach to water resources planning and to modernize the Reclamation Act of 1902.

Andrus led the drive for comprehensive Alaska lands legislation, devising a plan that he says would protect the state's scenic and wildlife resources while availing the majority of its mineral resources for development. He was instrumental in obtaining Congressional approval for expansion of the Redwood National Park in California.

The expansion warded off damage from logging.

As governor, Andrus strongly supported regional approaches to the delivery of health services and better state funding of education. He has been involved in Native Americans' receiving a fair return on their mineral resources and in asserting their water and fishing rights.

Andrus was born in Hood River, but spent much of his youth in Idaho, where he currently resides.

Preceding Andrus' address, Gary Grimm and Katy Flanagan of Mountain Visions productions will present an 11-projector, 5-screen multi-media wilderness concert. And following the speech, pictures will be shown of Idaho's famous River of No Return, an area Andrus helped preserve.

Admission to the speech and concert is $1.
