

Food expert says

American aid comes with strings attached

By JANE DE VIRGILIO
Of the Emerald

Repressive governments not committed to reducing poverty and hunger are receiving the majority of American food and development aid, a foreign aid analyst said Wednesday night.

"About 50-percent of bilateral aid allocations are concentrated in 10 countries that are some of the worst human rights violators in the world," said David Kinley, author and coordinator of the Aid Education Project for the Institute for Food and Development Policy.

Indonesia, El Salvador, Bangladesh, Thailand and the Philippines receive three-times more in development loans than countries with equal or greater need, Kinley said.

The institute independently analyzes food and the causes of world hunger, seeking "alternatives to the use of foreign assistance as a political tool of the U.S. government," Kinley said.

"Most every country can already produce enough food to feed the population of their country, yet one in every three people in the world still go hungry," Kinley said.

The institute is working to alter the concentration of control over food-producing resources in Third World countries that keeps "the powerless from gaining anything from the powerful," he said.

The World Bank annual report shows strong American allies get the most help, Kinley said. Countries give the World Bank funds proportionate to their Gross National Product.

The World Bank's distribution of aid — $12 billion to the Third World last year — "is not impartial.

"In fact, only about one quarter of aid ever benefits agricultural development. Three quarters goes to industry build-up, urban development, and commerce as part of a 'trickle-down' strategy that does not benefit the landless, rural poor," he said.

Through the Aid Education Project, Kinley is encouraging others to take a stand against giving foreign aid to most of the countries it's going to.

"We have to rechannel our moral obligation to give aid," Kinley said.

"We must resolve to get out of their way and largely let them help themselves," he said. "Through my travel and experience I have found that the poorest people in the Third World are the most generous. It shows a strong indication they are willing to work together to solve their problems."
